Mr. MORRILL. After it is read a second time I shall move to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will not be in order until the joint resolution is read the second time.

The joint resolution was ordered to a second reading, and was read the second time.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that question debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of reference is debatable.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say a word or two in regard to this matter. I will not detain the Senate any length of time, but I wish to show from figures which were collected after the very careful investigation of this matter by Dr. Evans, of my State, a member of the House of Representatives, the number of trade-dollars held in our State. He collected this information by correspondence with banks and bankers holding these dollars, and it appears as follows:

An inventory of the number of trade-dollars taken and now held by banks, bankers, trust companies, and private individuals at their face value and at a discount in the State of Pennsylvania:

Banks, bankers, and trust companies at par	796,749
Private individuals and societies	1,641,134
At a discount from 10 to 15 per cent	123,044
Total	2,560,927

Of that number it will be seen that only 123,044 trade-dollars were obtained at any discount whatever. All the rest of that vast sum of money is now in the hands of bankers and private individuals in Pennsylvania, the coin being received by them in due course of business at par as a dollar of the United States, as a coin of the United States, and so declared by the existing law of the United States to-day, for those very words are still found in the act of 1873, which declare the trade-dollar one of the coins of the United States. And, sir, I could produce letters here by the score from people in Pennsylvania, in one instance a letter from a school director stating that he had some of this coin which he had received as an official, and in another case from the treasurer of a Sunday-school who received it in the same way, and from individuals all over the State.

I know as a matter of fact that there is the same condition of things in my own town. Until last year when the hue and cry was raised against the trade-dollars, those dollars circulated in my community precisely as any other dollars. I have taken them myself, I presume hundreds of them. They were paid out in the same manner precisely as the Bland dollars were and as greenbacks were, and were as much a part of the current money of the United States in that community as any other dollar. I have here letters from bankers, and I have received within the last week three or four from bankers, one of which I remember stated that he had $18,000 in his bank which he received at par in due course of business. Another said that he had over $20,000; and a gentleman of Philadelphia connected with one of the largest banks in that city called on me, introduced by Hon. Mr. RANDALL, and stated to me that they had in their bank over $40,000 of these trade-dollars on their private account which they had received in due course of business, and he stated that they had a very much larger amount of them received on special deposit.

I know that it has been stated that large numbers of this coin have been received by merchants of Philadelphia and other sections of Eastern Pennsylvania after advertisement when it was stated in the advertisement that they would receive them in their trade as other dollars. I have made inquiry as to that, and I have a letter from a gentleman who is employed in the subtreasury in Philadelphia in which he states in relation to John Wanamaker whose case has been instanced as one of speculation in this matter, that he did in fact receive these dollars precisely as he received the greenback dollars. He says he had seen them paid over the counter in the same way, and that the prices of the goods were the same as if paid for in greenbacks. I think it is the fact that Mr. Wanamaker has something like 100,000 of these dollars, and he states himself that he received them in due course of business. Other gentlemen have made similar statements. Every single newspaper of the city of Philadelphia has declared that it is the bounden duty of this Government in honesty and decency and fair treatment, and not desiring to repudiate any of its coin, to take up these dollars and make them good in the hands of the holders. I can not for myself see how any person can hesitate in that view of the case.

I do not desire to detain the Senate with regard to this subject. I feel very earnest in reference to it, because it is a matter of very great importance in Pennsylvania. I know that in 1877 these trade-dollars were paid out in very large quantities to the laboring men of that State. In the county of Schuylkill hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid out to the laboring men, to the men who worked in the mines and the manufactories and on the railroads, by railroad and other corporations of that State, and they were received by those people as the coin of the United States. They bear the impress of the coin of the United States. It is true they are called trade-dollars, but they were a legal tender by an act of Congress until that act was repealed, and as I stated before they are still denominated coin of the United States. In my judgment this Government might as well repudiate its promise to pay the legal-tender dollars of the United States as decline to make these dollars good in the hands of the people.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I shall vote against the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Finance because that means necessarily that no action will be taken upon the subject at this session. I am in favor of paying the trade-dollars without distinction, whether held in this country or in China, by the standard silver dollar. I am not in favor of an invidious distinction in behalf of the man who happens to live near the city of Washington or the subtreasury in New York or Philadelphia.

The resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to pay ten millions of trade-dollars. He proposes to extend the time until the 1st of September, in which they may be paid. That length of time will enable every trade-dollar held all over this Union to find its way to the Treasury. When these coins have found their way to the Treasury we are estopped by this law which allows the Treasury to pay off only ten millions. I object to paying any part of the trade-dollars until we pass a resolution or bill to pay them all. They are as much an obligation of this Government as the standard silver dollar of the country. They were made by the Government a legal tender for debts. They are mentioned in the laws of the United States as one of the coins of this Government. This Government is obligated by every consideration of honor and justice, in my opinion, to redeem the trade-dollars which it has by its own act accredited. But I will not vote to pay one of them without including all, and unless the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania can be amended.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to say a word?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. If the Senator will permit the vote to be taken on the question of reference to the committee so as to get the subject before the Senate, then I am perfectly willing that there shall be some amendments made to the resolution. I do not think it perfect. I want the vote of the Senate taken on it, and would like to get the subject before the Senate for discussion. If the Senator will permit the vote to be taken now on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, if that motion be defeated the resolution will be before the Senate, and we can then proceed with it.

Mr. McPHERSON. The question is now before the Senate on a motion to commit to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The resolution is not now open to amendment, but probably it can be amended so as to meet the views of the Senator from New Jersey after it is taken up.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have some amendments to offer in case the motion to refer to the Committee on Finance is not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Pennsylvania has got back with renewed health and strength, so as to push up the committees of the Senate to their proper work; but I presume the Senator from Pennsylvania is not aware that this question has been before the Committee on Finance, and received its laborious attention for the last six weeks at almost every regular meeting of the committee; and I assure the Senator, so far as I am concerned, that I have never been disposed to keep the House bill from the Senate. I was willing to have it somehow reported, either adversely or with amendments. I wish also now to say that the bill has bones and meat enough in it to consume the whole time of the Senate for the remainder of the week, judging by the discussion that took place in the committee.

In the first place, the Senator from New Jersey is wrong in supposing that we have any law or ever had any law to redeem the ordinary standard silver dollar. Anything that is issued in the shape of a dollar is not redeemed. There is no provision and never has been any provision in relation to the gold and silver coins of the country by which they were to be redeemed; but I do not wish to discuss now the merits of the measure.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator permit me——

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator will excuse me. After I get through he can say what he chooses. This proposition goes on the idea that we are to take the first ten million that may be offered—that is to say, Philadelphia being near the Mint, the people there will probably present all their trade-dollars at once; but this resolution does not make provision for any more than $10,000,000, while there have been $36,000,000 outstanding. It would cause the Government a loss of over $5,000,000 if it were to redeem them all to-day as proposed by this joint resolution in relation to the $10,000,000.

There are various amendments to a bill of this kind that arose in the committee and such as will be obvious to all. In the first place, if these coins are to be redeemed shall they count as a part of the monthly purchase of silver bullion of the country? We already have given authority and direction to the mints to coin not less than $2,000,000 of silver and not more than $4,000,000 every month. Shall this be taken as bullion and coined into those dollars or not?

In the next place, shall these dollars be taken where they have been subject to unusual abrasion and weigh less than when they were issued? Instead of 420 grains, suppose they do not weigh as much as the ordinary silver dollar, shall they then be redeemed? Again, shall we go on by setting this example of redeeming $10,000,000 and say that we shall be bound to redeem all that may be returned to us? I understand that these coins are now circulating in China as Chinese coins with a simple stamp of a Chinese letter on them. Therefore, in thirty days they might be brought back from China here to the extent of many, many millions; and the whole amount that has been issued is over $36,000,000.

But, Mr. President, I only mean to indicate some of the many troublesome points that are likely to come up in discussion, and to say, if this bill shall be brought before us, I am very certain it will take not only to-day, but it will take to-morrow, and all idea of adjourning at the end of this week would have to be abandoned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Finance, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,
Allison,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Farley,	Ingalls,	Palmer,
Beck,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Blair,	Garland,	Lamar,	Plumb,
Bowen,	George,	Lapham,	Riddleberger,
Call,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vance,
Coke,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams.

NAYS—20.

Brown,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jonas,	Pendleton,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Jones of Florida,	Platt,	Slater,
Conger,	McPherson,	Pugh,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—20.

Anthony,	Fair.	Kenna,	Sabin,
Camden,	Gibson,	Logan,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Cullom,	Groome,	Mahone,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Jackson,	Ransom,	Wilson.

So the motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER. I now call up the resolution to which I referred yesterday in relation to national banks, and ask that the matter be acted upon by the Senate. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] stated to me that he desired to submit some observations on it, but I should like to have a vote.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will take up the river and harbor bill now.

Mr. BUTLER. This matter can be disposed of in a few minutes, and I have been postponing it from day to day in deference to the wishes of Senators.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is it proposed to take a vote on the resolution or to have it discussed?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance, and upon that motion I should like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall not interpose if there will be no debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves to take up for consideration the resolution submitted by him June 11, 1884, directing the Committee on Finance to examine into the condition of the national banks of the city of New York.

Mr. BUTLER. I submit an amendment. I suppose I have a right to amend my own resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the impression that the question is whether the Senate will now take up the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. What point has been reached in the morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is now in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I now ask to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "law," in the first paragraph, "and shall have leave to sit during the recess."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent of the Senate that his resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL. I trust the Senator will allow it without debate to be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I can not permit it to be referred to the committee without debate. I shall have the yeas and nays on that motion if I can get them. I do not want to debate it myself, but I should like to have the yeas and nays on the proposed reference.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to its consideration this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the Chair understands that under the rule the resolution can not be now considered.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that an objection prevents its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of that impression, pending the morning business.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the morning business is through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not yet. The order of the introduction of bills and joint resolutions has not yet been concluded.

Mr. BUTLER. I will wait until the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is yet in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLER, of New York (by request), introduced a bill (S. 2357) for the relief of Jeremiah Simonson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 2358) making appropriation for a small light and fog-signal on Killick Shoal, Chincoteague Bay, State of Virginia; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2359) granting a pension to M. Louise Butler; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE SENATE MANUAL.

Mr. FRYE. Is there not a Senate resolution from the Committee on Rules on the table, called up yesterday morning and laid over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be for action at the close of the morning business, the Chair understands. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. If there be no resolution to be offered——

Mr. FRYE. I have one I want passed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to submit a motion to proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order, and under the order the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. FRYE June 27, 1884, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the direction of the Committee on Rules, a new edition of the Senate Manual in accordance with the suggestions made in their report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND. I suppose the reference is to the recommendation of the Committee on Rules made early in the session.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARLAND. It seems to me that we ought to have what is called a manual; such as the Senate has been working under for a long time, long before I became a member of it, a book including many matters sought to be stricken out by the committee. I really think some of them should be retained, but I do not care to put myself in opposition to the recommendation of the committee if they have recently reviewed the matter and are of the same opinion they were early in the session.

Mr. FRYE. The committee has been changed somewhat since that recommendation was made. It was made at the first of the session. As soon as the resolution passes I propose to call a meeting of the new committee and submit those recommendations to them, and I know that certain of the matters proposed to be stricken out will be retained.

Mr. GARLAND. I have nothing to say then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEW YORK BANKS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no concurrent and other resolutions, that order is closed.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate do now consider the resolution directing the Committee on Finance to examine into the condition of the national banks of the city of New York.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and will take the question on the reference to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the resolution is before the Senate for consideration, and I propose to modify it by inserting after the word "law" the words "and shall have leave to sit during the recess."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina modifies his resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I have moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Jonas,	Mitchell,
Allison,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Gorman,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Beck,	Hale,	Lapham,	Pike,
Blair,	Harris,	McMillan,	Platt,
Bowen,	Harrison,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Hawley,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,

NAYS—16.

Butler,	Farley,	Morgan,	Vance,
Call,	George,	Pendleton,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gibson,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Slater,	Walker.

ABSENT—21.

Anthony,	Fair,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Garland,	Mahone,	Vest,
Coke,	Groome,	Plumb,	Wilson.
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Edmunds,	Lamar,	Sabin,

So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, asked for a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. WILLIAM H. CALKINS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. On my objection a few days ago to a bill introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] it was laid over, and therefore it is that I desire to place him in the same position he was before I interposed the objection. The only object I had in interposing the objection was to prepare two or three amendments to the bill. I trust the Senate will take it up this morning. It is Senate bill 1642.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 631, being the bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senate will take up the river and harbor bill and proceed with it. That is the regular business pending, and any interruption at this time will lead to others and occupy the greater part of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1642.

The motion was not agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7012, being the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

WILLIAM HULL.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] yields to allow me to make a favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (S. 183) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William Hull. This man is, I may say, dying. I believe him entirely innocent. It is not possible to get relief under the technicalities of existing law, and I beg the Senate to pass the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 183) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William Hull. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion now standing upon the records of the War Department against the name of William Hull, late of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment of Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, and to grant to him an honorable discharge, with the same pay, bounties, and benefits he would have been entitled to if the charge of desertion had not been entered against his name.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM W. AVERELL.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the river and harbor bill to yield a few moments until I call up the bill (H. R. 2487) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army. I am sure it will take but a few moments.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are so many requests preferred in my immediate vicinity that I hope the Senator will not press me. I hope we shall go on with and get through with the river and harbor bill.

AMENDMENTS TO THE SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANSOM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. KENNA, after line 430, section 1, to insert:

For continuing the improvement of Little Kanawha River, West Virginia, the sum of $31,000 appropriated by the act of August 2, 1882, is made available.

Mr. KENNA. According to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], and for the additional reason that on examination last night I found that a substantially similar provision was in the original appropriation, I desire to modify the amendment, so as to make it read:

For continuing the improvement of Little Kanawha River, West Virginia, the sum of $31,000 appropriated by the act of August 2, 1882, is made available: but no toll shall be collected by any person or corporation for this improved navigation, and such right, if any exists, shall be relinquished in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War before the expenditure of said sum.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not understand the amendment fully. Does it make a new appropriation or make the appropriation heretofore provided for available?

Mr. KENNA. It only makes that available and I have embodied in the amendment a provision which I found on examination of the RECORD was contained in the original appropriation as it passed the Senate two years ago.

Mr. CONGER. That no toll shall be charged?

Mr. KENNA. For the improved navigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I see no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer the following amendment: On page 32, line 771 of section 1, strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Improving Columbia River, at Cascades, Oregon: Continuing improvement, $250,000.

Mr. President, in offering this amendment I do not wish to complain of the Committee on Commerce. On the contrary, I duly appreciate and freely acknowledge on behalf of the people of the Northwest their liberality. I appreciate the arguments which are made against the increase of this and other appropriations, namely, that the appropriation bill of 1882 was for something over $19,000,000, and that this bill appropriates only about two-thirds in the aggregate of the amount of that bill, and that there will probably be before the 4th of next March another appropriation bill. It is not certain, however, that there will be an appropriation bill at the next session of Congress.

This is a very important work. On the 7th of March last I addressed the Senate at some length in regard to the improvement of the Columbia River, the importance of its present and prospective commerce, and the importance of this particular improvement. In my remarks at that time I said:

The annual rise of the Columbia occurs in May and June, and compels a suspension of the work. The work has been prosecuted at a disadvantage on account of the inadequacy of the appropriations. True economy in carrying on the work and its great commercial importance demand that it should be prosecuted as rapidly and completed as soon as the work can be done.

I also then quoted from the report of the engineer in charge, as follows:

The uncertainty as well as inadequacy of funds is an element in the increase of cost.

During the discussion of this bill Oregon has been frequently mentioned, and all the appropriations for the Pacific Northwest are sought to be charged to that State. The estimates and the appropriations are made for Oregon, Washington Territory, and Idaho.

The territory to which they are properly chargeable is as follows:

	Square miles.
Oregon	96,030
Washington	69,180
Idaho	84,800
One-half of Montana	73,039
Total	323,049

About forty times the size of the State of Massachusetts, thirteen times the area of West Virginia, over seven times as large as Kentucky, and containing Puget Sound with its 2,000 miles of shore and tributary streams, and the second river in magnitude in the United States, and which forms a part of two transcontinental lines of transportation; the estimates of the engineer for all these works is $1,728,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let that be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the unfinished business be laid aside informally and that the Senate continue the consideration of the river and harbor bill. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

Mr. DOLPH. The total estimate for all these works by the engineer in charge was $1,728,000. One-third of the estimates would be $576,000. The bill as it came from the House appropriated $325,000; as amended by the committee, $500,000; Senate amendment, $5,000; total, $530,000; still nearly $50,000 less than one-third of the estimates.

The works are all of great importance for which appropriations have been made.

I can not be expected to make much of a showing in regard to this improvement in the five minutes allowed. Several of the members of this body have visited that country and know the importance of improving the Columbia River. In 1880 the President of the United States visited the North Pacific coast and deemed the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the Northwest of so much importance that he did call the attention of Congress to the importance of those improvements in connection with the improvement of the Mississippi River, and, without reading it, I will ask that an extract from the message of President Hayes, in 1880, be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered unless objection be made.

The extract is as follows:

The two great rivers of the North American continent, the Mississippi and the Columbia, have their navigable waters wholly within the limits of the United States, and are of vast importance to our internal and foreign commerce. The permanency of the important work on the South Pass of the Mississippi River seems now to be assured. There has been no failure whatever in the maintenance of the maximum channel during the six months ended August 9, last. This experiment has opened a broad, deep highway to the ocean, and is an improvement upon the permanent success of which congratulations may be exchanged among people abroad and at home, and especially among the communities of the Mississippi Valley, whose commercial exchanges float in an unobstructed channel safely to and from the sea.

A comprehensive improvement of the Mississippi and its tributaries is a matter of transcendent importance. These great water ways comprise a system of inland transportation spread like network over a large portion of the United States and navigable to the extent of many thousands of miles. Producers and consumers alike have a common interest in such unequaled facilities for cheap transportation. Geographically, commercially, and politically they are the strongest tie between the various sections of the country. These channels of communication and interchange are the property of the nation. Its jurisdiction is paramount over their waters, and the plainest principles of public interest require their intelligent and careful supervision, with a view to their protection, improvement, and the enhancement of their usefulness.

The channel of the Columbia River, for a distance of about one hundred miles from its mouth, is obstructed by a succession of bars, which occasion serious delays in navigation and heavy expense for lighterage and towage. A depth of at least twenty feet at low tide should be secured and maintained to meet the requirements of the extensive and growing inland and ocean commerce it subserves. The most urgent need, however, for this great water way is a permanent improvement of the channel at the mouth of the river.

From Columbia River to San Francisco, a distance of over six hundred miles, there is no harbor on our Pacific coast which can be approached during stormy weather. An appropriation of $150,000 was made by the Forty-fifth Congress for the commencement of a breakwater and harbor of refuge, to be located at some point between the Straits of Fuca and San Francisco, at which the necessities of commerce, local and general, will be best accommodated. The amount appropriated is thought to be quite inadequate for the purpose intended. The cost of the work when finished will be very great, owing to the want of natural advantages for a site at any point on the coast between the designated limits, and it has not been thought to be advisable to undertake the work without a larger appropriation. I commend the matter to the attention of Congress.

Mr. SLATER. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 32, line 771 of section 1, it is proposed to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Improving Columbia River at Cascades, Oregon: Continuing the improvement, $250,000.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to say a word in support of the amendment. The last appropriation bill of two years ago gave to this work $265,000. I can say now that in the last report printed very cogent reasons are given why at this session there should be a large appropriation. The work is nearing that condition in which large appropriations are necessary in order that a certain lock or gate may be done in one season. There is a great loss at this work, and it is so I presume at all works of this character, by the limited appropriations Congress makes. Each succeeding year the plant must be renewed, some of it stored, and a great deal of work must be done to prevent the loss of the work already completed. It would be economy for Congress to give all the money that could be properly consumed or used in one season in order that the work might progress as rapidly as men and money could push it. In view of the condition of this work, in view of the demands of the country in that section of the United States, in view of the fact that it is not a local work but a national work in the highest sense, I trust the Senate will allow this amendment to be put on the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Just a word, because I said a word the other day of objection to the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to increase another appropriation.

The junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] was a member of the committee. The committee tried its very best to do justice in this bill to all sections of the country where it believed improvements were required by the necessities of commerce. There is no greater increase in any State than the committee gave to Oregon. I wish to call the attention of the Senate once more to the fact that on page 13 they increased Oregon $25,000 on a new item, that on page 14 they increased it $10,000 on another item, that on page 32 they increased it by an item of $150,000, that on the same page they increased it in another item $10,000, that on the same page they increased it in another item $5,000, that on page 33 they put in a new item of $10,000 more. It does seem to me that the two Senators from Oregon are pressing the Senate inordinately I am reminded that the Senate itself also put in $5,000 more.

Mr. FARLEY. Where?

Mr. FRYE. The day before yesterday for Coos Bay, on Page 13. Now, I hope the Senate will not do anything more for Oregon considering all the advantages she has now had in committee and in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senate will not adopt this amendment. I think I can scarcely add anything to the remarks which have been submitted by the Senator from Maine. The Committee on Commerce have increased the appropriations for Oregon above the House bill $205,000, and have appropriated for that State $516,000, more than half a million. The improvements are all great and important improvements. That is conceded. The Columbia River is an important stream and this improvement at the Cascades is a very important one; still it can not be finished in a year, and it is not creating any obstruction that is not a natural obstruction already. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 104 of section 1:

For continuing improvement of South River, New Jersey, $10,000.

This has been recommended by the engineer in charge, and the condition of South River is peculiar. It seems that last year when the appropriation was used in the South River it became necessary under a decision of the engineers to undertake to straighten a portion of the channel. The appropriation was almost entirely exhausted in doing that work. Now, the improvement has got to that point that to stop it is to give away everything that has been done and virtually abandon the work. An appropriation of $10,000 is sadly needed to carry out the original intention with respect to the river, and the sum of $10,000, now appropriated, I understand will about complete the work. Some $[illegible],000 has already been appropriated to that river in years past, and to-day not a single steamer can go up or down the stream owing to the incompleteness of the improvement. I ask that the appropriation may be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is a statement in the engineer's report in regard to this improvement, but there is no appropriation for it in the House bill; and if this had been an important improvement, one requiring any immediate attention, in framing this bill the proper authorities would certainly have considered it, because they have given very general attention to these improvements, and the improvement, as I understand it, is not a very important one in any event. It refers, I think, to an improvement near the mouth of the canal, or an artificial channel at one of the mouths of this river, where it enters into Raritan Bay. If I understand the description aright that is it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is a branch of the Raritan River, emptying into Raritan Bay.

Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? The State of New Jersey in the House, if I am permitted to speak of the House of Representatives, has no representative upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which framed this bill, but every member of Congress from that State called on the committee and showed the importance of the improvement recommended by the engineer in charge. And why does the Senator say it is not an important matter?

I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman who lives on that stream, engaged in commercial enterprises there, that shows the importance of the improvement to the manufacturing enterprises located along that stream, and I understand from this letter that there are some four or five hundred thousand tons annually of materials going in and out of that stream. It would really seem to me that it was of sufficient importance to give it $10,000 in order that the stream might not be obstructed as it now is by the system of improvement which the General Government saw fit to carry on. This recommendation is only a part of what is carried on. I take it that merely because the House has not seen fit to put in so important an improvement as this in the river and harbor bill the honorable Senator from Minnesota, with all these facts before him, will not dispute the propriety of the appropriation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This improvement is referred to in the report of the engineers.

Mr. FRYE. Will not $5,000 do?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I only ask the amount General Newton asks for as necessary to complete the improvement.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The engineer's report says:

South River is a tributary of the Raritan, which it enters by two courses, the one natural and the other artificial, 1½ miles below the former.

The original condition of the navigable channel is, first, a false direction of the canal mouth, a depth there at mean low water of 3½ feet; thence up to Little Washington, depth varying from 3.1 to 11.6 feet at mean low water; thence to Bissett's brick-yard, depths varying from 2.8 to 10.1 feet at mean low water, and thence to Old Bridge, depth varying from 2.1 to 12.5 feet at mean low water.

There are also several sharp bends above Little Washington where it will be expedient to straighten the course occasionally by cuts.

The committee in considering the appropriations for New Jersey increased the appropriation for Maurice River on an amendment submitted by the Senator from New Jersey. This improvement appeared to the committee of no very great importance, there being so many of greater importance demanding improvement and appropriation; and the committee in considering this subject thought we should not add it to the bill. It is impossible to tell what amendments may be offered here, but the amount of the bill may be made much larger than is anticipated. I shall be compelled to insist on the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have one other amendment to offer, and then I shall retire. This amendment is on page 16 of the bill, line 366 of section 1, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "eighty-five."

I think that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not say that this is not an important improvement. It is the improvement of Newark Bay, a great channel of communication between the city of New York and the city of Newark, and also up the Passaic and Hackensack Rivers. I have before me a resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Newark, also the recommendations of the Newark Board of Trade, asking for a larger amount of money than that already given. I will read them:

NEWARK, N. J., March 14, 1884.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, representing the Passaic River Protective Association, respectfully call your attention to the importance, not only to the members of this association but to all of your constituents, of the improvements now being made to the Passaic River by the General Government, and solicit your aid in obtaining the necessary appropriations to carry forward the work to completion.

There are about 1,000,000 tons of freight, consisting largely of building materials, coal, ice, and general merchandise, carried to and from our city by the vessels navigating our river, and you are too familiar with the benefits of river transportation as a means of competing with the railroads, and thus reducing the cost of transportation on all the articles carried by the railroads as well as by river, to make it necessary for us to enlarge on this point.

The project adopted by the Government in 1880 provides for the formation and maintenance of a channel two hundred feet wide and ten feet deep at mean low water from the mouth of the river to the Centre street railroad bridge at Newark, with an entrance to the channel at the mouth of the river four hundred feet wide.

At the close of the season of navigation of 1883 there had been constructed a dike 2,000 feet long at the mouth of the river, and a channel two hundred feet wide from that point through the N. & N. Y. R. R. bridge, and one hundred and thirty feet wide for 1,000 feet from the bridge, and one hundred feet wide thence to Market street bridge, and seventy feet wide between Market street and Centre street bridges.

The funds now in hand will suffice to make the channel one hundred and twenty-five feet wide between the last-mentioned points. An appropriation of $85,000 is required, according to the report of the engineer in charge, to complete the project according to the plan adopted, and $35,000 of that amount is asked for this spring to enable the contracts for work to be done during the summer to be made in time to avoid delay.

For further information in regard to expenditures already made, &c., we refer you to the report of the United States engineer in charge of the work, a copy of which accompanies this letter.

We trust that you will kindly accede to our request to give this important matter your early attention, and oblige,

Respectfully, yours,

JAMES R. SAYRE, JR., President.
L. L. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. W. H. F. FIEDLER, M. C.

BOARD OF TRADE, Newark, March 15, 1884.

DEAR SIR: At the regular meeting of the board of trade, held on Wednesday evening, the 12th instant, the following preamble and resolution was presented by George B. Swain, and unanimously adopted by the board:

"Whereas the United States Government has recognized the commercial importance of the city of Newark and shown its appreciation of the value of proper water communication in having had prepared by Chief Engineer John Newton a plan for permanently improving the channel of the Passaic River and Newark Bay, and for the prosecution of such plan there has been appropriated by Congress and expended since 1880 some $80,000, and according to the report of Col. George L. Gillespie, United States engineer, now in charge of the work, a further sum of $85,000 is needed to complete the same, $35,000 of which is needed at an early day in order that the work now in progress should not be interrupted, and is considered by the engineer in charge a proper sum to be made as an advanced appropriation: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Board of Trade of the city of Newark, appreciating the importance of the work above referred to, hereby request our Representative in Congress, Hon. WILLIAM H. F. FIEDLER, to use his earnest efforts to secure the appropriation as named."

JAMES W. MILLER, President.
P. T. QUINN, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM H. F. FIEDLER.

I modify my amendment, and move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty," in line 366. I will be moderate and ask only for a reasonable increase to $50,000, and I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not object to it. It is for improving the Passaic River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 366 of section 1 it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Passaic River below Newark, and removing shoals in Newark Bay, New Jersey: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am compelled to resist the amendment. The Senator, I believe, proposes to amend this item by changing the appropriation from $25,000 to $85,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty thousand dollars it reads as modified.

Mr. McPHERSON. I withdrew the original amendment and offered one for a less amount.

Mr. McMILLAN. The whole amount of the estimate for this improvement, as made by the engineer, according to the report before me, is $85,000, and the amount in the bill is not quite one-third of the estimate. That has been the fair proportion of the estimates allowed. I think the Senator should be satisfied with the appropriation made in the bill. The item just before it has been increased $10,000 by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will bear with me a moment. The character of this improvement in Newark Bay is a little different from many others. There is a shifting, sandy bottom, in some places a mud bottom. The improvement was to open a channel some two hundred and fifty feet wide in order that vessels of suitable size might pass through the channel. The Senate very well knows that to continue an improvement every year by using one-third of the amount estimated, before the second and third year's appropriations can be used the money appropriated for digging out a certain part is entirely wasted, as the place is filled up again. Such improvements should be made rapidly in order that the water itself may keep the channel clear, and it would be wisdom at the present time to appropriate the entire sum and expend it in one year and then trust the water afterward to keep the channel clear rather than by digging it out by sections to simply permit it again to fill up. I know that $50,000 can be used there during the next fiscal year with great profit and at a very great saving also with respect to future appropriations. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to make an amendment to this bill, after line 268 of section 1, on page 16. The amendment is relative to the improvement of the Raritan River and also Raritan Bay. I will state for the information of the Senate that the Raritan River is used in connection with the transportation route which runs on the interior water line from New England to North Carolina, the commerce of which is about the largest in this country. It passes between Staten Island and New Jersey, and the connection is with the Raritan River and the Delaware and Raritan Canal, the Delaware River, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, the Chesapeake Bay to the south, and northward and eastward with Long Island Sound, the North River, the Erie Canal, and the great lakes. So practically this is the most important point in the whole system of inland navigation.

As an instance of it I would state that at one point in this line of water communication in one year were passed 98,000 vessels with a tonnage of 13,500,000 tons, while during the same period there passed through Sandy Hook to the great port of New York 9,974 vessels with a tonnage of 5,864,531 tons. The tonnage that I refer to is the largest commercial tonnage in this country, larger than that of the Mississippi River, larger than that of the North River.

General Newton has had charge of the district referred to, with his headquarters at New York, but he was changed and Colonel Gillespie took his place; but General Newton reserved the improvements in the Raritan River to himself; $2,399,000 was the estimate. He reserved that work for himself. Consequently Colonel Gillespie's did not include the Raritan River, but the report of General Newton does include that improvement. The committee of the House, evidently supposing that the change turned over this work to Colonel Gillespie, left out the recommendation of General Newton for the improvement of the Raritan River. They took up Colonel Gillespie's report, and for the Raritan Bay, which the engineers recommended $60,000 for this year, they did allow $20,000, but that has nothing to do with the Raritan River.

The amendment offered by me was submitted to the Committee on Commerce, and as I understand it was practically adopted by that committee, but was inadvertently left out. I ask the chairman if that is not so?

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendment was considered in committee, and I think it was at one stage of the consideration of the bill considered favorably to a certain extent. What is the amount?

Mr. SEWELL. The amount for Raritan River that I desire is $60,000, and I desire $25,000 for Raritan Bay.

Mr. McMILLAN. Raritan Bay is in the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. For $20,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. We did not consent to increase it.

Mr. SEWELL. But did agree to insert the river.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think we agreed to $20,000 for Raritan River.

Mr. SEWELL. That would not be enough to keep up the work that is going on. I present this case where the tonnage is greatest. I ask for $60,000, and it is a very small amount.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think $60,000 is the amount of the estimate.

Mr. SEWELL. That is the estimate, and the work is of great magnitude, costing in all $2,000,000. In consequence of the passage of this great tonnage the work must go on. If you stop the tonnage, you stop the work. I move to add after line 368 of section 1:

For continuing the improvement of the Raritan River, $60,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator had better say $25,000.

Mr. SEWELL. I prefer not. I will modify the amount to $40,000. I think that is a considerable reduction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 368 of section 1 it is proposed to insert:

For continuing the improvement of the Raritan River, $40,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amount that can be expended profitably during the year on this improvement is estimated in the engineer's report at $60,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars, the amount the committee thought a reasonable sum, would be more than one-third of the estimate. That we considered a reasonable amount. In view of the importance of the improvement at this great channel of commerce, the committee will not make any opposition to an amendment for $25,000, but beyond that we do not feel at liberty to consent. I hope the Senate will retain the amount at $25,000 if they insert the amendment at all.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from New Jersey came to me, and I did favor the proposition before the committee.

Mr. SEWELL. I went before the committee myself.

Mr. CONGER. I know the Senator did, but he was called away at the time we reached this.

Mr. SEWELL. The committee gave me a hearing afterward.

Mr. CONGER. The opinion of the committee was that this ought to bear the same proportion generally given to places where there is no special reason for an increase, but I find in my memorandum $35,000 is what I understood the committee would assent to. The very fact that this whole river is covered and has been for years, and it will be whether there is any appropriation or not, with boats, shows that the navigation is going on. These improvements will make it better all the while, as they will anywhere; but now that we know what the committee proposed to do I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $35,000 instead of $40,000.

Mr. SEWELL. The action of the committee seems to be to make a reduction on what anybody asks and on what the engineers recommend, regardless of whether there is a report in the case or not. Here I present a case that has more tonnage than the Mississippi River. I asked for $60,000; I am willing to reduce it to $40,000, but the committee will only give me $35,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, to strike out "forty" and insert "thirty-five."

Mr. McPHERSON. I think in this case is found a most excellent illustration of the method upon which the river and harbor bill is constructed. My colleague presents a case of a river over which or through the waters of which there is more commerce usually than the entire foreign commerce of the port of New York. It is the connecting link between the North and the South by the interior water line. The amount of money my colleague asks for is absolutely needed in order to keep commerce moving upon these waters, and the Committee on Commerce will take up a trout stream somewhere in the interior of the country and devote to its improvement all the money needed to move its extensive commerce and deny to this stream the amount absolutely needed to keep boats from being obstructed in the channel.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to know the name of that trout stream, because I am in favor of striking it out if it is there.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think the river and harbor bill is full of them.

Mr. FRYE. It is not. I went into the Committee on Commerce with the idea that the river and harbor bill was full of trout streams, and for about a week I thought every river almost that came up in the South because the engineers removed snags and cut down overhanging trees and wanted to get three feet of water was a trout stream. I came out of committee convinced that there are no trout streams in the river and harbor bill; that there is no stream that a United States engineer under his oath as an officer to do his duty and under the law has not been compelled to say whether the necessities of commerce require the improvement, and in every single case he has said it. I am no marvelous friend of river and harbor bills and ordinarily have voted against them, and have voted against them with that same idea, but I should like to have the Senator from New Jersey point out a trout stream in this bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not disposed to point out any trout streams in the bill. I do know this, and the Senator from Maine knows it very well, that there is more commerce passing hourly over this river for which my colleague asks an additional appropriation than there is yearly over many streams found in the river and harbor bill or than will be over them in the next forty years.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Commerce is passing there without any serious obstruction and this is a great enlargement of facilities which already exist. This amount can be expended profitably, and no more.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Additional facilities are needed, and I have always supposed that the true province of appropriations of money out of the Federal Treasury for rivers and harbors was to improve great rivers and harbors, the great national water ways of the country. I have ever voted for appropriations of money to improve the Mississippi River; I will vote for any needed appropriation of money to improve any harbor along the Atlantic or Pacific seacoast; I will vote any needed appropriation for the Columbia River, for the Ohio River, but when it comes to appropriating large sums of money for the purpose of improving little streams that never can be commercial streams, in the proper acceptation of that term, then I am opposed to it. And I do submit that when a proposition is made here for the purpose of removing obstructions from one of the avenues through which it is shown that there is more commerce going to-day than the entire foreign commerce of the port of New York, there is sufficient reason for supporting it.

Mr. CONGER. It does not appear in the discussion that the reason navigation can go on upon this river is because some State—I will not say what one—owns the canal and charges heavy tolls on property going from the waters of one great bay into the waters of another, and that there is no diminution of tolls because the Government undertakes to improve a portion of that communication which the canal company undertook to improve. There are numerous canal-boats, barges, small craft going through from one great bay into another under great tolls charged upon the canal; and in order to make that canal profitable it was necessary for the company or the State which owned the canal to improve the Raritan, and they did do it until it was put on the river and harbor bill. It vastly increased the tolls of the canal, it vastly increased the transportation of produce and merchandise along that line of communication, and it is very well it should; but I do not know that Congress has as a general rule been eager to make improvements that would make profitable a canal merely, or throw additional tolls into the treasury of a canal company.

These things should be taken into consideration. If there have been appropriations made for rivers as there have many in the South, long rivers having three, four, and five feet of water, where snags had to be removed, where in order to make them passable appropriations must be made, we should remember that for hundreds of miles within two or three States through which those rivers run there was not, and is not up to the present time, any other possible mode of communication by which the people of the interior through which these streams run can reach the seaboard or can reach the navigation of the bays and of the ocean.

There are an immense number of canal-boats and barges passing from the Delaware Bay into New York Harbor by this route, a canal that the Government does not own, a canal that charges heavy tolls, tolls enough not only to improve the canal, but to improve the Raritan River which is a part of the transportation route. Now, I think $35,000 to aid in that line of improvement, as compared with the other appropriations in the bill, is a fair allowance. It is to make little improvements to make easier the navigation. The river is deep enough during all seasons of the year, but it needs the removal here and there of some shoals, it needs enlarging in some places that rafts of boats may pass with ease and with rapidity. It is a work which must be continued for two or three years. It is better not to do it all at once because there are increasing, and continually increasing, obstructions to the river. This appropriation will remove them this year, another appropriation will remove them another year, and a third the third year when we might hope the objects of the appropriations will have been accomplished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to correct an impression created by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that the Senate is proceeding under the eighth rule in considering this bill.

Mr. SEWELL. Which does not allow a Senator to speak more than once on the same amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent to say a word. ["Go on."]

The river is not a deep one. The project as set forth by the engineers requires the deepening of several points along the line of the river. From the facts I have brought to the attention of the Senate, it is seen that it is proposed to have a continuous improvement there every year to the extent I named, about $60,000, although I am willing to take the chances on $40,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the chairman of the committee what is allowed for the Raritan Bay?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Nothing but what is contained in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. SEWELL. No additional amount?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. LAPHAM. I offer the following amendment to come in on page 5, at the end of line 89 of section 1:

Improving harbor at Wilson, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The report of the engineer recommends the sum of $30,000. The engineer says:

That sum can be profitably expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, upon this work.

It is a harbor upon Lake Erie. I ask for one-third only of the sum recommended by the engineer, and I hope it will be adopted.

I will state that the amendment was sent to the Committee on Commerce, but I understood they had virtually concluded the consideration of the bill before it reached them, and therefore it was not formally acted upon by the committee, but it was introduced and referred to them before the bill was reported back to the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This item is not contained in the bill as it came from the House, and the committee did not insert it. It is sufficient I think to say that the appropriations made for the different harbors in the State of New York are already of such an amount as to preclude the Senate from increasing that amount. We have already made large additions to the appropriations as they came from the House. This harbor is referred to in the report of the engineers, and I will read what is said about it:

Wilson Harbor, New York.—The project for the improvement of this harbor was adopted in 1873 and modified in 1877, the object being to afford a channel of navigable width and twelve feet in depth by the extension of two parallel piers from the mouth of Twelve-Mile Creek to the twelve-foot curve in the lake, with the formation of a protected channel between the piers. The mouth of the creek was originally obstructed by a bar, upon which there was a depth of about one foot.

Before the commencement of operations by the United States the piers had been carried about four hundred feet into the lake by private enterprise.

The amount expended to June 30, 1883, is $42,054.94, and has resulted in the extension of the piers to the eight-foot curve in the lake and the formation of a protected channel between the piers of navigable width and a depth of eight feet at low water.

The engineer placed the estimate for this year at $30,000, but the amount available on the 1st of July, 1883, was $7,945.06. While of course the improvement is one that would be beneficial to the locality, yet it is not such a one as should be now inserted in this bill to increase the amount of the appropriations, particularly in view of the amounts already appropriated to the different harbors in the State of New York.

Mr. LAPHAM. I only desire to add one word, if I may be permitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAPHAM. While it is true that a large amount of money is appropriated in this bill for the whole State of New York, there is but a very small portion of the appropriation for that end of the State where this harbor is found, the western end of the State. Of course what is done for the great harbor of the city of New York, which collects seven-eighths of the revenue of the Government, transacts almost all the commercial business of the country, ought not to be taken into consideration in determining this question. This is an important harbor, and individual enterprise had gone four hundred feet into the lake before the Government took hold of it. It is necessary in order to complete it that some more money should be furnished. I only ask one-third of the estimate of the engineer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will offer one other amendment. At the end of line 89 of section 1 I move to insert:

Improving harbor at Olcott, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The facts in this case are almost precisely the same as in the previous one. The estimate of the engineer is that $30,000 can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year, and I only ask for one-third of that sum.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from New York has correctly said that the facts in this case are very similar to those in the one just disposed of. The engineer says:

The project for the improvement of this harbor was adopted in 1866, at the date of the first appropriation, and proposed to connect the deep water in the lake with deep water in Eighteen-Mile Creek, by the extension of two parallel piers from the mouth of the creek to the 11-foot curve in the lake, with the formation of a dredged channel between the piers. The project was modified in 1874 and 1880 to provide for the removal of rock found to exist in the channel between the piers. The natural channel between the mouth of the Eighteen-Mile Creek and the lake was covered by a bar upon which there was a depth of about 1½ feet of water.

The amount expended to June 30, 1883, is $118,000, and has resulted in the extension of the piers to about the 9-foot curve in the lake and the formation of a protected channel between the piers of navigable width, with a depth of about 7½ feet at low water.

The same arguments used in the last case are applicable here, and there is no reason why the Senate should change its action. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. After line 134 of section 1 I move to insert:

Improving harbor at Manatee, Fla., $10,000.

The report of the engineer contains the following statement in regard to it:

There is at present a least depth of eight feet at mean low water, not sufficient for the class of vessels engaged in the commerce between the river and outside ports.

The improvement can be accomplished by dredging, at an estimated cost of $70,000.

The engineer says:

I have heard it asserted by sea-faring men and others that this is about the best harbor on the Gulf coast of Florida. It is certainly a very excellent one and very capacious. It would seem to be good policy to promise a safe refuge for vessels caught out in the heavy storms for which this coast is noted, and there is certainly no other place which can compare with it as a harbor.

The immediate commerce of the country adjacent to the harbor of Manatee amounted in the year 1881 to $138,000, fruits and vegetables, and to from seven to eight thousand head of cattle shipped abroad. There had been appropriations made for the improvement of that harbor for several years, but this year it is omitted entirely from the bill. There is no place which is more important to the Gulf commerce for an improvement as stated by the engineer, and none where it can be done at so small a cost.

I hope there will be no objection to inserting the amount of $10,000 as proposed by the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I must resist the adoption of the amendment, and will refer to the report of the engineers in regard to this improvement. Under the title of Manatee River the Chief of Engineers says in his report:

The present project for the improvement of this river was adopted in 1882, the object being to afford a channel of entrance from Tampa Bay to Manatee River, so as to give a depth of thirteen feet at mean low water from Tampa Bay up the river to Shaw's and McNeil's Points.

The least depth on the bar at the mouth of the river before the improvement was eight feet at mean low water, not sufficient for the class of vessels engaged in the commerce between the river and outside ports.

The amount expended to June 30, 1883, is $3,038.99, but no results of consequence have been gained.

And in the appendix, on page 1028 of the report, the engineer says:

The benefit to commerce to be derived from the completion of this improvement is the increased facilities for shipments of the products of the county, mostly fruits and other perishable products, and it is reasonable to infer that this would cause a large influx of population and a corresponding increase of productions.

The bill is not framed upon the principle of inducing the settlement of the country. When that is incident to an appropriation, it is no objection of course to appropriating for an improvement, but unless the demands of commerce are such as to require an improvement we do not feel at liberty to insert an appropriation in the bill. I hope the Senator will not press the amendment. The committee considered it very fully, and did not regard it as one of the items which should be in the bill.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say a single word further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALL. I am surprised at the Senator from Minnesota quoting the report in that way. Certainly that is only one of the advantages recommended. The report of the Coast Survey shows the value of that harbor as a port of refuge, and the report of the engineer distinctly states that fact. There are over fourteen hundred miles of coast in the State of Florida. I will read from the last report of the engineer. The one I have read states the harbor to be, in his opinion, one of the most excellent on the coast. I can only urge that the Government of the United States with this long line of coast in the State of Florida has entirely neglected it. The entire commerce of the Gulf of Mexico passes along and around it. And yet it is left without a safe place of refuge, with a coast commerce of not less than $1,000,000 from sponges, fish, coral, cattle shipped to Havana, and tropical fruits and timber to the other States, it is left with absolutely no means of ingress and egress to and from the ocean; and I ask for a small appropriation to enable the vessels to get out and in from the harbors and tide-water rivers of the long line of coast.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. After line 134 of section 1 I move to insert:

For improving Charlotte Harbor, Florida, including Caloosahatchee River and Peace Creek, $5,000.

I will state that Charlotte Harbor is shown by the Coast Survey to have a depth of from nineteen to twenty and twenty-one and twenty-two feet, is connected by the Caloosahatchee and Kissimmee rivers and lakes with the upper portions of the State, running to within forty miles of the Saint John's River, with which it is now connected by rail, and affords a transit across the peninsula of Florida to Key West, and Havana and other foreign ports. These rivers are shown by these surveys to have in places in or near their mouths only two, three, and four feet of water over some of the bars. The bill has an appropriation of $5,000 for the Caloosahatchee River. Former appropriations in the two last years contained I think about $7,000 for Peace Creek, which has been partially improved. I ask for this $5,000 for the continuation of that improvement and for the improvement of the bay at its mouth.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am unable to find in the reports of the engineer any examination or report of the survey of Charlotte Harbor, in Florida. No estimate has been made for any such improvement. With reference to the river mentioned, there is, I believe, an item in the bill, but in the present report of the engineer there is no estimate or recommendation of an appropriation for Charlotte Harbor, Florida.

Mr. CALL. My friend the chairman of the committee has not looked over these reports as carefully as he should have done. On page 1219 of the report of 1882 I find the following——

Mr. McMILLAN. I refer to the present report of 1883; the present report.

Mr. CALL. In the report of 1882, part 2, volume 2, the Senator will find a survey made for the opening of steamboat communication from Saint John's River, Florida, by way of the Caloosahatchee River to Charlotte Harbor, with Peace Creek; and he will find in addition to that the appropriation made for two years for Peace Creek. I can turn to it in a moment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I spoke of the harbor.

Mr. CALL. Caloosahatchee River empties into Charlotte Harbor. There is an appropriation in this bill for Caloosahatchee River, and this appropriation is asked for Peace Creek and the entrance into Charlotte Harbor. On page 1276, part 2, volume 2, of the report of 1882, I find the following:

An appropriation for this improvement of $7,000 was made by act of Congress approved March 3, 1881. This appropriation not being sufficient to admit of both building and equipping a suitable log-boat, and leave enough of the appropriation to work to advantage, authority was asked and obtained to build one in conjunction with the improvement of the Withlacoochee River, which was done, and the boat put to work on the Withlacoochee.

* * * * * * *

The amount, exclusive of former appropriations, required for the completion of this work is $5,700, which will not be permanent, but will require a small annual appropriation.

No statistics are obtainable. The principal trade is in cattle and oranges.

The work is in the collection district of Key West, Fla., and Key West is the nearest port of entry.

MONEY STATEMENT.

July 1, 1881, amount available	$7,000 00
July 1, 1882, amount expended during fiscal year, exclusive of outstanding liabilities July 1, 1881	2,423 33
July 1, 1882, amount available	4,576 67
Amount appropriated by act passed August 2, 1882	4,000 00
Amount available for fiscal year ending June 30, 1883	8,576 67
Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project	5,700 00
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1884	5,700 00

The report of the survey across the peninsula and into Charlotte Harbor contains a statement of the bars necessary to be improved in order to make this appropriation heretofore made of $7,000 available.

Mr. McMILLAN. As I stated when I replied to the Senator from Florida, there is no estimate for an appropriation for Charlotte Harbor contained in the report of the engineers. There is a report in regard to Caloosahatchee River and Peace Creek. These streams enter into Charlotte Harbor, as the Senator has informed us. There is an appropriation in the bill for the Caloosahatchee River, continuing improvement, $5,000, which is one-third the estimate made by the engineer as contained in the report. In the absence of any report for the improvement of Charlotte Harbor, except perhaps what the Senator has referred to, the Coast Survey report, which is not the basis for making an appropriation in the river and harbor bill, I trust the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I am perfectly willing he shall call it Peace Creek, if he chooses, instead of Charlotte River.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; Peace Creek, I understand, empties into Charlotte River.

Mr. CALL. Put it all into Peace Creek then.

Mr. McMILLAN. The improvement for that is not in the bill, and should not be inserted in it. There was available on the 1st of July out of the former appropriation for Peace Creek $4,063.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Senator from Minnesota will permit me, I should like to ask him a question with respect to the proportionate allowance made by Congress on the engineer's report. Will the Senator state what is the average sum allowed by the Committee on Commerce for an improvement according to the engineer's report? Has there ever been any estimate made on that subject?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir, there has not been. The general rule of action in framing the bill, as I understand, is to allow about one-third of the estimate, more or less, with exceptions to that rule of course at some places where the improvement requires a greater expenditure. Circumstances may require the completion of an improvement, and in that case a greater amount will be appropriated.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is about the average?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir, that is intended to be the average, the rule upon which the bill is framed, as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. Inasmuch as the Senate committee have not given the State of Florida, with its 1,400 miles of seacoast, anything, notwithstanding the large increase which they have made in the appropriations for other States, I wish to do justice to my State at least in intention and effort on my part. In line 145 I move to strike out "twenty," before "thousand," and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Tampa Bay, Florida: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

The estimate of the engineer for the improvement of Tampa Bay, Florida, completing the improvement, for this year is $55,000. The Coast Survey reports exhibit the fact that the harbor of Tampa Bay is one of the most important, if not the first in importance, after Pensacola on the Gulf coast. The depth of water at anchorage under the northern shore of Anna Maria or Palm Key is 10, 11½, and 12½ feet, and up the bay to Point Pinelos 21, 22½, and 23½ feet. It is the terminal point on the Gulf of Mexico now of a railroad from the headwaters of the Saint John's River, and of another one soon to be finished from the eastern and middle portion of the State connecting with Fernandina, the city of Savannah, and the northern railroads. There are six or eight seacoast steamers constantly plying there. It is in receipt of a large foreign commerce, and the place of shipment for cattle to Havana, and has become a port of very great importance. I ask that the appropriation of $20,000 be increased to very nearly the amount of the estimate made by the engineers for this year.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The appropriation contained in the bill now is more than one-third of the estimate of the engineer for this year. The improvement of Tampa Bay is found in the report of the engineers, and the amount estimated for the improvement is $57,000. The amount inserted in the bill is $20,000, which is more than one-third of the estimate. From the character of the improvement it is very evident that the appropriation made will be sufficient for this year.

The report of the engineer states:

The object of this work is to facilitate navigation to the town of Tampa, the approach to which is a narrow and shallow channel through the upper bay, 5.5 feet being the depth at mean low water.

In 1881, under an appropriation of $10,000, 18,530 cubic yards of material were excavated, deepening and partially straightening it for 2,900 feet in length, 9 feet deep, and 60 feet wide.

The improvement for which the appropriation is desired is for this excavation, for enlarging the channel up to the docks at the town. Of course they could spend more than $20,000, but $20,000 will be ample for the work during the present year, and it has received its full and fair consideration in proportion to the amount of the estimate.

I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 143 of section 1 I move to amend by striking out "five" before "thousand," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten;" and after the word "dollars" to add "including the channel from Suwannee River to Cedar Keys;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Cedar Keys, Fla.: Commencing improvement, $10,000, including the channel from Suwannee River to Cedar Keys.

I desire to say in regard to this as all the other ports upon this long and unprotected coast around which the entire commerce of the Valley of the Mississippi, of Mexico, and of the Central American countries passes, they are all ports of foreign commerce. They all produce considerable quantities of sponge along the coast, and they are the depot and places for the sale of it. They are places of shipment of cattle; they are places which are beginning to supply the place of a large foreign importing fruit trade of this country, amounting to several million dollars, and paying nearly $800,000 of customs duties; and they are rapidly supplying the local demand of this country in the fruit trade and in the other respects which I have mentioned have a right to favorable consideration.

Mr. MCMILLAN. So far as I am advised, no survey or report upon this improvement is contained in the regular report of the Chief of Engineers transmitted through the Secretary of War to Congress in 1883, the last report we have on this subject. There was an examination made and a special report submitted since the report of the engineer, to which I have referred, was transmitted to Congress. I think the amount contained in the bill will be quite sufficient for this year. For the purpose of establishing that point I shall read briefly from the report of the engineer who made this examination and survey, A. N. Damrell, major of engineers, contained in Senate Executive Document 128 of this Congress:

Referring to the object of the appropriation—

The object would be to obtain a channel with a least depth of 10½ feet from the Gulf of Mexico to Cedar Keys. There is now a least depth of 9½ feet.

The depth of 10½ feet for the projected channel is proposed, because it is believed to be sufficient for the present commerce of the port, and because to obtain any greater depth would be expensive, as it would require considerable rock excavation, the limestone formation underlying the entire channel at a depth of from 9½ to 12½ feet.

There has been some expenditure of money upon this improvement, and it is very evident from the reports we have in regard to other improvements in that vicinity that the amount appropriated in the bill, the sum of $5,000, will accomplish a very considerable proportion of all that is desired and intended. I hope the Senator will not insist on the increase.

Mr. CALL. I will only add to what I have said, by permission of the Senate, that Cedar Keys is the terminal point on the Gulf of Mexico of a railroad running from Fernandina on the Atlantic Ocean. It is a place of extensive transit. The interstate commerce from the Gulf ports passes over that road and finds a place of shipment at Cedar Keys to foreign countries and to New Orleans, Mobile, and elsewhere around the coast. It is a very important port, and the sum of $5,000 is entirely inadequate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. After line 143 I move to add:

Improving harbor at Crystal River, Fla., $5,000.

There is a report and estimate for that made, I think, in 1881 or 1882. The bill as it came from the House contains an appropriation of $5,000 for the Withlacoochee. The harbor at Crystal River, Fla., on the Gulf of Mexico, is important as an entrance for the rivers which discharge into it. It is the place of entrance and exit for the commerce of the adjacent country. It is connected with a large extent of country which is beginning to produce a vast quantity of tropical fruits, being one of the richest portions of Florida. The bill contains an appropriation for the improvement of the rivers on the coast, but according to the theory of the bill it is right to improve the rivers but not their mouths or the exit and the entrance to them. I have asked for a small amount in order that the improvement which is put upon the rivers may be made useful in furnishing harbors for the vessels which must carry away the freights which they bring.

Mr. MCMILLAN. We were compelled to confine our attention to some report and examination of the improvements which indicated a present necessity for additional appropriations at this time. The report of 1881 is too far back to consider in an appropriation for this improvement in view of the appropriations already made to the State of Florida. Of course there are very many rivers and harbors in the State of Florida which could be beneficially improved, but we are compelled to confine ourselves to the important improvements contained in that State and to give them a reasonable appropriation. If there is no report or recommendation by an engineer within three or four years, it is very good evidence indeed that the improvement is not one which is pressing in its character, and it can wait at least for another year in order to have a survey and examination made upon which we can act.

I hope the Senator will see the propriety of not pressing this amendment.

Mr. FRYE. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce might have added that the committee examined with a great deal of care and fidelity every item in Florida and listened to arguments in favor of all these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 512 of section 1, before the word "hundred," I move to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Improving the channel over the bar at the mouth of Saint John's River, Florida: Continuing improvement, $250,000.

I hold in my hand a report made by a committee of the Board of Trade of the City of Jacksonville, Fla., one of them a gentleman of distinction in the profession of law, and the others in the commerce of the country, and one of them Governor Drew, lately the governor of the State; Mr. Durkee, marshal of the United States, and Mr. Charles H. Jones, editor of a leading journal in the State, signed by J. J. Daniel, chairman committee on improvement of Saint John's Bar; George F. Drew, Joseph H. Durkee, Charles H. Jones, subcommittee. This paper states:

The values of vessels and cargoes arriving at and departing from the port of Jacksonville in 1882 amounted to $38,270,000. Upon this amount the increased insurance over that of neighboring ports caused by the risks of commerce crossing the bar was ¾ per cent., or $287,025.

This paper has been before the Committee on Commerce and the Senate, and has already been presented and urged on both for favorable consideration in every possible form. It is a clear, a valuable, and a convincing statement for those who are willing to be advised. It shows the great value of the Saint John's River to commerce and its future great capabilities, and the wastefulness and entire inadequacy of the small appropriations that have been made. If there were any means in my power by which I could enforce these statements, and change this system of small and inadequate appropriations and substitute large and sufficient amounts for a smaller number of objects, I would most certainly make use of them.

The tributaries to the Saint John's River commerce are very extensive, and run throughout the eastern and southern parts of the State of Florida and the lower portion of the State of Georgia. The harbor is a necessary place of refuge for the commerce of the entire coast. This is true of all the harbors on the coast of Florida, for the vast commerce of the United States and all foreign countries passes along the Atlantic coast. A distressing instance of the neglect of the Government in providing suitable harbors of refuge is exhibited in the recent death by shipwreck off the coast of Florida of an officer of the United States well known in this country, which has been reported to the Senate, and this is the third time since I have been in the Senate when this neglect on the part of our own committees and of Congress has caused the destruction of large ships and large numbers of human beings and great amounts of property, all of which might have been saved by a liberal appropriation for the improvement of the harbors along the coast of Florida. The importation of tropical fruits to the United States amounts annually to about $5,000,000, and these pay a revenue of about $700,000; so Florida can furnish all this if you will aid her.

I ask that this appropriation be increased not only on the ground of humanity, not only on the ground of the interest of commerce itself, not only because of the great resources of the Saint John's, but because the money already expended by the Government, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, is being thrown away and entirely lost by the washing away and the destruction of the work which has been done each year under these small appropriations. By the time the work is done tremendous storms come, and the work not being sufficiently high above the water to prevent the waves from washing over, currents are created on the inside, and the work is seriously damaged if not entirely destroyed. There is no consideration of propriety, or of economy, or of good sense which does not demand that, while this bill has increased in various instances the appropriations for the interior and some other portions of the coast, this appropriation for the Saint John's Bar should not be in like manner increased. I have urged before the committee with all the influence I could bring the appropriation of $500,000 this year for the continuance of this work, and I am greatly disappointed that the committee have not granted it. The necessity for at least this amount for the ensuing year is indispensable.

I shall not detain the Senate by stating the facts which have been exhibited by the engineers so repeatedly further than to say that $500,000 is the smallest amount which has been estimated as being useful or being really advantageous in a very high degree for the continuance of the work at Saint John's Bar for this year. I only desire to add that the cost of insurance yearly is more than the appropriation that I now ask for. This single fact is argument enough to demand that twice the amount proposed in this amendment should be voted without hesitation.

Mr. McMILLAN. There are two principal improvements going forward in the State of Florida to which the special attention of Congress has been given. One is the work under consideration, improving the channel over the bar at the mouth of the Saint John's River, Florida; another is improving the entrance to Cumberland Sound, which is a very important improvement. The expenditure which will be required to complete these projects is very large, but the improvements are not of such a character as that they can be completed at once.

The improvement in the Saint John's River which is now under consideration is to increase the depth of the channel across the bar at the mouth of that river. The principal part of the commerce passes through that locality. The other improvement is a very old one and was considered very favorably years ago by the Government of the United States; but since the war, since appropriations have been made for these improvements, the improvement adopted for accomplishment by the Government has been the improvement at the Saint John's River. The principal business of that State is transacted over the Saint John's River. The estimate of the engineer for this improvement is $600,000, and the House of Representatives appropriated $150,000. In addition to this the appropriation for the improvement upon Cumberland Sound is $75,000. If the Government could carry forward one of these improvements to its completion the annual appropriation of course could be increased; but as it is insisted that the Government must give attention to both of them the appropriations must be divided. Under those circumstances it is impossible for the Government to appropriate all that perhaps might be done upon one of them.

I hope the Senator will not insist upon this amendment. Besides this appropriation for the mouth of the river, there is a small appropriation for another portion of the river.

Mr. CALL. If I may be allowed to say one word——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALL. Both of these improvements are necessary improvements, not to Florida but to the commerce of the country at large. The improvements have both been progressing only within the last five or six years, and the principal amounts have been expended upon them within that period of time. It is absolutely necessary, as the report of the engineer shows, for the preservation of this work and what has already been expended upon it, that not less than $500,000 should be appropriated this year. It is one of those works that requires a large expenditure in the beginning. If the Government had spent the $500,000 when it commenced the work it would be worth a million dollars now in place of being greatly injured if not nearly destroyed. These facts are shown by the statements of the engineer.

The Saint John's Bar is an exposed place. It is a river with three hundred miles of navigation, from eight to ten miles wide in a great many instances, running from the south to the north, and at its mouth the storms accumulate shifting bars, so that if we are to pay any attention to the economical expenditure of money this should be made an exception. While other appropriations have been increased largely where the improvement does not come within the rule it ought to be applied here and a large amount should be appropriated, at least $260,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 136 of section 1 I move to strike out "seventy-five" before "thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

Improving entrance to Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

I wish to say in regard to this improvement that here are two States interested. The port of Fernandina is connected by railroad with the entire country north, with the State of Georgia, and with the peninsula of Florida by two diverging lines of road. It is easily susceptible of being made an entrance for the largest and deepest ships that navigate the ocean. It is a place where the Navy of the United States, if we should ever have one, could easily rendezvous in the time of war. It is a natural harbor capable of being made one of the finest and cheapest and safest of entrance upon the Atlantic coast.

A considerable amount of money has been heretofore expended, and this fine harbor is being delayed in its improvement and perhaps injured, as is the harbor of Saint John's, by the small amounts annually appropriated, so that the committee instead of benefiting these arteries of commerce may be injuring them by the small appropriations made. It is true they have a right to the appropriations which the engineers have recommended, or to a reasonable proportion of them, and the engineers have stated that they are easily susceptible of being made valuable arteries of commerce, safe places of entrance for ships, places of refuge, and places where the existing amount of commerce is large, and where the annual saving would be equal to the appropriation. I insist with earnestness that the Senate shall see that justice is done to this important place, and that no unfair and unequal discrimiation shall be allowed in this bill. It is true these two harbors are near each other, but they are both necessary for the country. Nature has placed them where they are, and given to each its separate and peculiar commercial relations.

I therefore ask that in this case, one of the few harbors that may be easily and cheaply made accessible for the largest ships, and a harbor connected by rail with all parts of the country, and having now an important coastwise and some foreign commerce, the amount shall be increased from $75,000 to $150,000, that being but a small part of the amount estimated for. I should ask a larger amount, the full amount of the estimates for both of these important ports, if the committee had not already refused it, and I now ask for this small increase of the House appropriation.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. A while ago I asked the Senator from Minnesota who has the bill in charge a question, which was not without an object. We have fallen into the habit of regarding appropriations in a river and harbor bill as being made for States. I take it that when an appropriation is made in a bill like this it is made for the country without regard to States. When the Federal Government acts in its constitutional character it treats the country as a whole. When the States act within their limited jurisdiction they act with respect to their own territory. The Senator from Minnesota said that the average sum allowed for improvements was about one-third of the estimates contained in the engineers' reports. The Engineer Department has estimated for Fernandina not because it is in Florida but because it is a great national harbor worthy of national support and improvement.

I should like to know why an exception to the rule suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce should have been made in this case. Not one-sixth of the amount recommended has been allowed. The officer of engineers to whom we have confided the power to say what improvements ought to be made has said that $600,000 ought to be expended on this harbor as a point of national consequence and the insignificant sum of $75,000 was allowed. That does not come up to anything near the standard that has been established by the committee, according to the admission of the chairman himself.

I have introduced an amendment following the line of my colleague appropriating $100,000 for Fernandina, and I think it is a reasonable request. Florida owns no ships of any consequence. The commerce that goes to those ports comes from the great centers of the North, a great deal of it from the State of my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who takes a great interest in matters of this kind. The ship-masters from his State and from all over the North are interested in these matters because they are national. It is not a local affair, and it does seem to me that in reason and in justice the amendment of my colleague ought to prevail. I could show that under this bill such a State receives so much and another State receives so much; but that is not the way to put this question.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? We may make a compromise. So far as I am concerned, if Florida will stop I will vote for an increase of $25,000. I will make a compromise if Florida will stop.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I shall object to any such bargain as that. We should know what the committees recommend, and I propose to stand by the committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am done.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is the improvement to which I referred in my remarks upon the appropriation for the improvement at the mouth of Saint John's River. I then stated that there was a second improvement in the State of Florida which in its character was an important one. But the demands of commerce are that the improvement shall be carried forward as rapidly as possible at the mouth of the Saint John's River; and if justice were done, in view of the requirements of commerce as they exist at present, the appropriation for Cumberland Sound would be omitted in the bill, and that amount would be transferred to the improvement at the mouth of Saint John's River. However, in order to keep the improvements which have been commenced at Cumberland Sound progressing in some degree, so that when the demands of commerce shall require it the improvement can be carried forward more rapidly, this appropriation of $75,000 is made.

The improvement consists of extending jetties in Cumberland Sound. The engineer in the last report says that the jetties are in a very satisfactory condition. Of course they could expend more. They estimate in favor of this improvement $600,000. They could expend any amount of money in carrying forward the jetties, but commerce does not require that the improvement should be finished at once. It does not require that it should be finished faster than we are at present carrying it forward. An increase of the appropriation, as proposed by the amendment, would render necessary a decrease of the appropriation at the mouth of the Saint John's River, not at this time but in future appropriations. It seems to me that both the interests of Florida and the interests of commerce require that the improvement at the mouth of the Saint John's River should go foward as rapidly as it can, and that this improvement having been commenced should receive sufficient attention to keep it from being injured until the other improvement is finished, or substantially so. Then this one can be taken up and carried forward with greater rapidity to its completion.

The improvements in Florida in the bill have received $286,000. There are a great many places that could be improved there. We could expend the whole amount embraced in the river and harbor bill on improvements in the State of Florida, but that is not the way to carry on these improvements, and we must exercise judgment in distributing the amount. I should be glad to appropriate greater amounts for these improvements. I should be glad to carry on both these improvements rapidly if it could be done in harmony with the interests of commerce, not only in that State but in other places. That is the only reason why I am opposed to an increase in the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 139, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Improving Apalachicola Bay, Florida: Continuing improvement, $20,000.

I shall not detain the Senate by referring to the reports, which are full, as to the necessity of this appropriation. Apalachicola Bay is the mouth of the Apalachicola River, which is made by the junction of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers. The Chattahoochee runs on the boundary line of the States of Georgia and Alabama, running far up into the north of Georgia and the northern portion of Alabama, and the Flint River runs through a large portion of Southwestern and Middle Georgia. Apalachicola was formerly one of the chief ports of the Gulf of Mexico for the shipment of cotton. It is becoming again a valuable port for foreign commerce. Large ships find entrance there and take from there square timber, sawn timber, and hewn timber, and it is becoming again a place of very great importance as a commercial port. I ask that the appropriation be increased to $20,000 in view of these considerations.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I must oppose the increase of this appropriation. For many reasons which I have already stated, the Senate should vote down the amendment. The statement of the improvement as it is contained in the reports of the engineers shows:

The amount expended to June 30, 1883, is $44,342.06, and has resulted in securing a channel seventy-five feet wide from the 11-foot curve inside the bar to the 9½-foot curve on the outside, thereby increasing the depth available for commerce from four feet to nine and one-half feet at mean low-water.

For the commerce which the Senator from Florida states exists there, this gives an ample channel at the bay for present purposes. The improvement going forward will be carried on rapidly enough with the appropriation of $10,000 for the coming year. Congress meets again in December; but a few months intervene before another appropriation bill will be presented to Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and this amount will suffice for the interval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. After line 139 of section 1 I move to insert:

Improving channel and harbor at Key West, Fla., $100,000.

I suppose this amendment will be refused as all the others have been. I will only say what everybody knows, that Key West is a terminal point of the territory of the United States; that it is the key to the Gulf of Mexico; that it is the place of refuge for all the vast commerce, amounting to several thousand million dollars, that passes between the Island of Cuba and the coast of Florida; and that any other government in the world would bestow upon it great consideration. In point of fact it has received little or none; but I shall do all in my power as long as I am here to obtain for it a just share of the benefits of the Government. It is a little island, from seventy-five to one hundred miles from the main-land, away out into the sea. It has a most industrious population—a population that contributes to the revenues of the country several hundred thousand dollars a year; and every consideration of national pride and of national interest and of the commerce of the whole country requires that this appropriation should be made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. From the amount expended here there is already a channel of eleven feet at mean low water, and there was available on the 1st of July, 1883, $23,573.12. That was estimated as sufficient to carry on this improvement. Of course Key West is an important place, but whether we should make an appropriation is the question presented to us. This amount will enable the engineers to carry forward the improvement sufficient for the present. The House committee considered this matter very fully and omitted it from the bill, and the Senate committee, after having given the matter full consideration, did not change the bill in that respect as it came from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. After line 139 of section 1 I move to insert:

For improvement of the entrance to the Aucilla and Wacissa Rivers, Florida, $5,000.

I will only state that the estimate and the survey for this work will be found as far back I think as 1881 or 1882. It is sought to make this a place of shipment and water transportation to the county of Jefferson and a portion of Madison, in Middle Florida. These are large and valuable counties, the land in which is fertile and productive. As is stated by the report of the engineer, there is a large amount of Government land immediately adjacent to these streams.

Mr. MCMILLAN. May I ask the Senator where that report of the engineer is to be found?

Mr. CALL. It is to be found in the report for 1881 or 1882. I have the report here, but it would take some time to look it up. I shall not detain the Senate by examining the report. Perhaps it is as far back as 1879 or 1880. I could find it, but I do not care to detain the Senate. I wish to bring these tide-water streams on the coast of Florida to the attention of Congress, and to demand for them the consideration they have a right to as avenues to commerce on the high seas.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the amendment be voted down. I shall not detain the Senate with any further remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 514 of section 1, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "five" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Improving the upper Saint John's River, Florida, $20,000.

I will only say that there has been a special report made by the Chief of Engineers, which was before the Committee on Commerce, as well as all the other reports relating to the amendments which I have offered, showing the necessity of these appropriations. There are not less than 100,000 people who every winter and year go from the different States of the Union to travel upon the Saint John's River. There is growing up a great commerce in tropical fruits in the counties of South Florida, which is already beginning to supply the market in the United States. I have here the statistics of fruit entered for consumption at the port of New York for 1883:

Articles.	Value.	Rate of duty.	Amount of duty.
Cocoa-nuts	$200,637	Free
Pine-apples	109,903	20 per cent	$21,987 60

Total amount of value for the year 1883, $4,745,357, and of duty $745,364.74.

All of which will in time be supplied by Florida, and a large part find shipment on the Saint John's River.

This river requires some improvement. It is one of the finest streams in the world. It widens from three to seven miles, being a series of lakes running far south in the peninsula of Florida. It requires an appropriation to straighten it in order that steamers of large size, even those that come from the coast, from Savannah, from Charleston, may find access to the headwaters of the river as far south as Lake Monroe. I ask that the appropriation for this great river with its tributaries, having more than three hundred miles of navigable waters with the waters connected with it, be increased from the pitiful sum of $5,000 to $20,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no very detailed report in regard to the improvement of this portion of the river. Any appropriation made under this description would be expended on the Saint John's River, the upper portion of it above Palatka where a smaller class of boats now navigate the river. In addition to this general amount of $5,000 which is appropriated for this improvement of the upper Saint John's there is another item contained in the bill under a different title: "Improving Caloosa Bar," which is also, I think, on the upper river, a particular locality at the foot or mouth of Lake Saint George; so that there are $7,000 appropriated in the bill to that portion of the river, and I think it is ample.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 141, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

I shall not detain the Senate more than a moment in regard to this amendment. The reports for many years, the reports of the Coast Survey, and the engineers' reports, the history of the country, all exhibit the importance and value of the port of Pensacola. Its foreign commerce amounts to several million dollars, and is all returned in money to this country. As has been well said, it is at all times a port capable of holding the navies of the world. It is being injured, according to the statement of members of the board of commerce and the committee appointed to investigate it, who are gentlemen of intelligence and high character, by the formation of an outer bar lessening the depth of water which can be carried into the port. At some times over two hundred foreign vessels are to be found in the harbor of Pensacola. All the large ships of the coast when they have occasion to seek a Gulf port go to Pensacola.

The future of the place, connected as it is by rail with the great iron and coal fields of Alabama, is one of magnificent promise.

While the estimate for the inner bar and the work contemplated by this estimate is $55,000 or about that sum, only a little more than the appropriations, yet it has been so carefully examined and the facts are so well attested both by the engineer and others in regard to the necessity of an additional appropriation for removing and widening the channel, that there can be no good reason why the additional appropriation should not be made and that immediately.

The necessity for liberal appropriation for this great harbor has been so often and so earnestly urged by both my colleague and myself on the committee and in the Senate and is so well known to Senators that I refrain from further observations in regard to it at this time.

Mr. McMILLAN. The item contained in this bill appropriates $50,000 for the improvement of this harbor at Pensacola. The estimate of the engineer is $55,000; so that the appropriation is within $5,000 of the entire estimate of the engineer. This is the only report we have in regard to this harbor. If there is any other new improvement to be undertaken it should be upon an examination and survey by the Engineer Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, as this amendment relates to a port with which I am somewhat familiar because it is at my own home, I desire to say a few words in regard to it.

It is true, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that the recommendation of the engineer is for $55,000 to complete the existing system of improvement with regard to that important harbor, and I think we ought to give that at least.

While I am on my feet I wish to say that in the country there is a misconception with regard to the manner in which appropriations under the river and harbor bill are made. Some people seem to think that we ought to be able to appropriate in Congress sums of money exceeding those recommended by the board of engineers. Well, under the rules of both Houses, I know enough of the workings of Congress to know that that can not be done. This is a very important harbor. I say it is the most important harbor south of the Chesapeake, and I do not exaggerate the importance of its commerce when I say that in point of tonnage it is almost equal to any in the Gulf of Mexico. Last year they had clearances from the port of Pensacola of five hundred and sixty-five vessels, three hundred and fifty-one of which went abroad. Think of it, Mr. President, in one year five hundred and sixty-five ships entered and cleared from the port of Pensacola. There is nothing local in that. While it is naturally a fine harbor, the board of engineers concede that some improvement is necessary to be made. They entered upon a system, an imperfect one as I think it is, but that system contemplated the expenditure of a given sum of money, and they said that to complete that system $55,000 would be necessary and could be expended during the present year.

If we are legislating on a broad national platform, so to speak, not with a view of doing things in a local way or merely distributing money from the Treasury to localities without regard to the advantage of commerce, let us give them what they ask. Nothing illustrates better than this the narrowness of the idea that prevails in reference to this bill that when it comes to a great harbor like this, with over five hundred ships entering and clearing from it in the course of a year, three hundred and fifty-one to foreign ports, no little trout stream, the Engineer Department say they have adopted a system of improvements for this harbor that requires the expenditure of $55,000 to complete it, and you give them $50,000 and leave off the $5,000. I say that I think we ought at least to give in this case the amount recommended by the Engineer Department. I ask my friend from Minnesota in all seriousness and candor if it is not reasonable under the circumstances to give the amount recommended to complete this existing project.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I move to insert on the same page, after line 141 of section 1:

For improving the harbor at Saint Augustine, Fla., $10,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that a new appropriation or is it simply an increase of one provided for in the bill?

Mr. CALL. It is a new appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. Upon that I make the point of order that it is new legislation. I withdraw the point of order if it embarrasses anybody.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. CALL. I am obliged to the Senator. I merely want a vote of the Senate. I do not think there is anything in the point of order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment. It is a new item and there is no necessity for it.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand the Senator from Minnesota to renew the point?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; I do not renew the point. I simply ask the Senate to vote down the amendment.

Mr. CALL. This is a very important harbor. Like these others on the coast it may be made a place of refuge. It has a fine depth of water and is capable of being made a very safe and valuable entrance. It is a place where a very large number of people from all the States are congregating every year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, as the Senate will not consider

Florida in the Union, apparently, at least not in the river and harbor bill for any increase of appropriation, I move to insert in the list of surveys in section 8—hoping that there will be a time when we shall be able to obtain some consideration—on page 54, after line 36:

Charlotte Harbor, Florida.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no survey of that improvement, and I see no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. In line 3 of section 8, on page 54, I move a verbal correction. The name "Wekeira" should be "Wekiva."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The orthography will be corrected.

Mr. CALL. On line 35 of section 8, on the same page, I desire to make another verbal correction. The name "Hermosassa" should be "Homosassa."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

Mr. CALL. I move to strike out line 36 of section 8, as follows:

Jupiter Inlet, on the Atlantic coast.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For canal and inland communication from Saint John's River, through Musquito Lagoon and Indian River, to Jupiter Inlet and Lake Worth, Florida.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator reduce the amendment to writing and let the Secretary have it? I presume there is no objection to the survey.

Mr. CALL. I will state that there has been a survey of the upper portion of Indian River and Musquito Lagoon, and the report is here. There is occasion, however, to have an estimate of the cost of the communication as far as Jupiter Inlet and to Lake Worth in the south.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary has not yet got the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I will hand it up.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not understand the Senator to insert any appropriation for this survey.

Mr. CALL. No, sir; it is to go in with the other surveys.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I see no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I said that it was not creditable to a great body like this to stand upon $5,000 in respect to an improvement like that alluded to a while ago at the harbor of Pensacola. The engineer in his report uses this language:

The sum of $55,000 can be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, in augmenting width of channel-way across the "inner bar," affording additional safety and facility to navigation, and in constructing the proposed works for restoring and preserving the west shore-lines.

The estimated amount, exclusive of appropriations already made for the entire completion of the existing project, is $55,000.

On page 70, line 140, we find—

Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

I move to insert $55,000 instead of $50,000, to enable the Engineer Department to complete this project at a harbor where they have, as I said, annually five hundred and sixty-five ships clearing.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If that is the statement of the engineer it will be necessary for the Senator also to embrace in his motion to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing." This appropriation is for continuing the improvement. It will be necessary to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The engineer's report says:

The estimated amount, exclusive of appropriations already made for the entire completion of the existing project, is $55,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will be necessary for the Senator, to make his amendment complete, to strike out the word "continuing," in the bill, and insert "completing."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Say "for improving the harbor of Pensacola, $55,000."

Mr. MCMILLAN. The word "continuing" is in the bill. To accomplish the Senator's purpose he will have to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is a mere verbal matter.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Still a very important change.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This is a particular project.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will be necessary in order to conform the amendment to the facts.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This is a special improvement for that harbor.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senate are fully advised of what this improvement is, and of the report of the engineer. If it is the desire of the Senate to increase it to the full amount of the appropriation for completing the project, I submit that to the Senate themselves.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. In view of the action of the committee and the indisposition of the Senate to make any change in the bill as reported, a Senator has very little encouragement to offer any amendment. Nevertheless, I feel it my duty to offer the following amendment: On page 20, line 464 of section 1, after the word "improvement," to insert "up to the mouth of the Uwharie River, in North Carolina," and in the same line to strike out "eight" and insert "thirteen," so as to make an increase of $5,000 for the Great Pee Dee River.

One word in explanation and I will not detain the Senate. The Pee Dee River is one of the longest in the South, having its source in North Carolina and flowing eastwardly and southwardly a distance of seven hundred miles, emptying into the Atlantic. Some years ago Congress undertook to improve this river from its mouth up, and the sums which have been appropriated for that improvement have been very small and the work of course proceeds very slowly. It has not yet reached to the line between North and South Carolina.

The dwellers on the banks of the Pee Dee in my State are anxious that some recognition should be made on the part of Congress of that portion of the river within North Carolina, and of the intention of Congress eventually to improve it, and therefore I ask that these words be inserted, continuing the improvement up to the mouth of the Uwharie, in North Carolina, and increasing the appropriation only $5,000, making it $13,000 for the whole improvement. That portion of the river in North Carolina flows through a magnificently timbered country, and even a very small improvement which the $5,000 would be capable of making would afford facilities for transporting timber from a region whose chief wealth is in timber.

I trust that the chairman of the committee will yield to such a modest and reasonable request; but if he should continue to harden his heart and disregard the "signs and wonders" which point to the importance of that stream, I hope the Senate itself will take it in hand and will vote this small appropriation for the purpose which I have indicated.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 464 of section 1, after the word "improvement," it is proposed to insert "up to the mouth of the Uwharie River, North Carolina," and to strike out "eight" and insert "thirteen;" so as to read:

Improving the Great Pee Dee River, South Carolina: Continuing improvement up to the mouth of the Uwharie River, North Carolina, $13,000.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If my memory serves me aright, this is a proposition in effect to declare the river up to that point navigable which is not now navigable, and I believe there have been some persons here and some petitions presented for this purpose, stating as the reason for improving the river up to this point that there has been a great cyclone, a great deal of timber has been blown down on the banks of this stream, and it is necessary it should be somewhat improved in order that the timber may be cut up and floated down. That is, I believe, the representation made to some members of the committee. I do not know as to the truth of this; but it is a proposition to go further up this river to a point where it is not now navigable by expending money upon it to make it a public highway.

I submit that it is proper for the Legislature of the State of North Carolina to do that. If it is desired to make this stream a public highway and use it for the purposes of lumbering the State ought to expend the extra money and ought to make it a public highway by an act of the Legislature and not ask Congress to do it.

The present expenditure upon the river is made about in the proportion that the other appropriations have been made, and it was thought to be entirely sufficient. But certainly the Senate does not desire to go any higher up this stream, for if we go much higher up I fear we shall get into the region of the trout about which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] has spoken so feelingly this morning. In improving this river we had better hold our improvement to the lower part of the river where it is really navigable, where it is of value, and where the object of expenditure is not simply to float logs down stream.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The question being put, the amendment was declared to be rejected.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for a division. I did not know the vote was being taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks for a division.

Mr. HOAR. Had not the Senator better renew the amendment in the Senate? Having a division requires the summoning of absent Senators. There was but one "ay" on the vote taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is suggested that the Senator from North Carolina can take the question as well in the Senate, and taking it now will involve the necessity of summoning Senators.

Mr. VANCE. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the bill on the fifty-ninth page, after line 113 of section 8, by inserting:

Harbor at Hyannis, with a view of deepening the harbor.

This is a proposition for a survey, and I have received by mail this morning a petition signed by a considerable number of shipmasters and other principal citizens there asking that this survey be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I beg leave to offer the following amendment—it is not for North Carolina. At the bottom of page 20 I move to insert:

Improving Saint Jones's River, Delaware: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that the amendment was offered by the Senator from North Carolina at my request. There is no appropriation made for my State south of New Castle, which is twelve miles from the northern line of the State. Below that point we have some ten different navigable streams emptying into Delaware Bay and one emptying in the Atlantic Ocean.

The report of the engineers shows that there is nearly a million dollars of commerce on the Saint Jones's River. There has been already an appropriation made in 1881 of $5,000 which the engineer has not used for the purpose appropriated. Two years ago the committee very kindly and the Senate put on an appropriation of $10,000, but it was dropped out in committee of conference. I have introduced the same amendment and the Senator from North Carolina by my request has offered it for $10,000. I have not gone before the committee to ask for an appropriation for my State, and I never shall do so. Wherever the engineers' reports are favorable I will call the committee's attention to the reports.

The report of the engineers in this case shows that this river floats a commerce of a million dollars, and if there were certain improvements made and the bar removed at the mouth of the river, there would be a very considerable increase of this commerce. The engineer's report will show the estimate as to the commerce of the river for which I have been trying to secure an appropriation for four years.

Perhaps if I had gone before the committee, as some persons have, clamoring for these appropriations, I should have had them, but I have not seen proper to do that. The Senate should act upon the merits of the proposition, as I hope it will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. In line 240 of section 1, on page 11, after the word "improvement," I move to insert "including dredging in the harbor;" so as to read:

Improving harbor of refuge, Sand Beach, Lake Huron, Michigan: Continuing improvement, including dredging in the harbor, $75,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to make a small amendment to this bill. I move to strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two" in line 938 of section 1, on page 39; so as to read:

Continuing improvement, $2,250,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. This is increasing the Mississippi River appropriation $1,000,000 in addition to the $1,000,000 already appropriated.

Mr. GEORGE. Four million six hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars was estimated for, and $250,000 appropriated by this committee is for damage that has occurred since the estimate was made, so that it is about $2,000,000 short.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I inquire of the Senator from Mississippi how much has been appropriated for the Mississippi River?

Mr. GEORGE. The appropriation stands, if this bill passes as now drawn up, $2,250,000 for the Mississippi River, of which sum $250,000 by an amendment made by the committee is specifically appropriated to Memphis Harbor and to repairs and damage occurring since the estimates were made by the Mississippi River Commission, so that in fact $2,000,000 is appropriated.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Mississippi River drains almost an entire continent. It is capable of floating the products of twelve or fifteen of the great States to tide water, and this is about the first appropriation Congress has made looking to an improvement of that river in a mode likely to be beneficial. Complaint is made——

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Let me ask the Senator a question. The Senator asked for the amount appropriated in this bill for the Mississippi River. The Senator from Mississippi replied $1,000,000. He should have stated that early in the session we passed a special bill appropriating $1,000,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. That has already been stated. I should like to compare the appropriations made for a single State in this bill, which I suppose has been very carefully considered by a very enlightened committee, one disposed to do exact justice in every case, with what is asked for here to improve the Mississippi River, running through several great States and carrying the products of many more over its bosom to tide water. Let me take the single State of Michigan, an interior State, bordered in no respect by any water, except the lakes, having but few rivers, and certainly not any of them that I think would be very much benefited by such improvements as it is proposed to make. I find the little State of Michigan this year has in this bill appropriations of $744,500 which I have footed up. I do not know how much more. I have counted that much of appropriations in the bill. What is it for? Look on page 10 of the bill:

Improving ice-harbor at Belle River, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $2,000.
Improving harbor at Black Lake, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.
Improving harbor at Charlevoix and entrance to Pine Lake, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.
Improving Pent Water Harbor, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

This last item the honorable committee saw fit to put in the bill as an addition to that already proposed by the House.

Improving harbor at Cheboygan, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.
Improving harbor at Frankfort, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.
Improving harbor at Grand Haven, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $50,000.
Improving harbor of refuge, Sand Beach, Lake Huron, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $75,000.
Improving harbor at Ludington, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.
Improving harbor at Manistee, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.
Improving harbor at Muskegon, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $20,000.
Improving Grand Marais Harbor, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

The last is also a new item which the Senate committee has seen fit to put in.

Improving harbor at Ontonagon, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.
Improving harbor at Saint Joseph, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.
Improving Marquette Harbor, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $5,000.
Improving harbor at Saugatuck, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $4,000.
Improving harbor at South Haven, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $7,500.
Improving harbor at White River, Mich.: Continuing improvement $10,000.

I should like to ask if there are any more harbors in that State or if it is possible to locate any more along its borders? Still further I find:

Improving harbor of refuge at Portage Lake, Michigan, $12.500.

Two entire pages of the bill are covered with improvements for a State lying way in the interior, and for no purpose in the world except to improve little harbors along the shores of the lakes. Now, go further. I call your attention to the twenty-ninth page of the bill.

Improving Detroit River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $200,000.

The House had appropriated $100,000, which it considered sufficient I suppose, but the Senate committee very generously have doubled it and made it $200,000.

Improving Hay Lake Channel, Saint Mary's River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $125,000.
Improving Saginaw River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $50,000.
Improving Grand River below Grand Rapids, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Then here comes again another item inserted by the Senate committee:

Improving mouth and harbor of Cedar River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

I know not how much more this bill contains for the State of Michigan, but certainly I have figured up here appropriations amounting to $744,000. I do not like to draw comparisons. I suppose that the State of Michigan is represented on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I know that the State of New Jersey is not, either in the House or in the Senate. We have more harbors, we have more water courses leading to the ocean, we have more need of improvements, and every dollar of money expended in that State is worth more to the general interests of commerce and navigation than it possibly can be in the State of Michigan. I think no Senator will dispute this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired. Is there objection to his continuing? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, Mr. President, I have thought at some time during my service in the Senate a river and harbor bill might possibly be constructed upon ideas of justice sufficient to encourage me in voting for it. I have never yet been able to vote for one; and seemingly, if this is a sample of river and harbor bills that we are asked to support, I never shall be able to give the bill my support, certainly not this bill. A bill which undertakes to take from the public Treasury $744,000 to improve harbors on the coast of Michigan is wrong, and every Senator must see it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I am not very familiar with these things, but I have been told that there passes up and down Detroit River alone a tonnage greater than enters Liverpool annually. Is not that true?

Mr. McPHERSON. I know nothing about the tonnage of the Detroit River. I have criticised no appropriation for the Detroit River. I never would criticise an appropriation to make the Detroit River what it ought to be for the commerce of that part of the country. I have never criticised an appropriation for the Mississipppi River, for the Hudson River, or for any of the great national water ways of the country, or appropriations to improve the national harbors. I have never criticised an appropriation for Boston Harbor, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, or any other harbor in the country, where I think it is just and proper to appropriate money for the purpose of increasing the commerce of the country. But when you undertake to surround a State with harbors and then take from the public Treasury six or seven hundred thousand dollars to improve them to the loss of other parts of the country, I am opposed to it.

The Committee on Commerce to-day have diligently and studiously avoided allowing any appropriation to enter into this bill that has been moved by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, and also upon the other side. My own colleague asked for an appropriation of money, not $200,000, nor $2,000,000, but forty or fifty thousand dollars to improve a water way, as he stated, over which more commerce passes than the whole foreign commerce of the port of New York, and it was not allowed.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will remember that the amendment was allowed to the amount of $35,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. You did give him $35,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendment was carried for that amount.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very generous! I thank you for it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator undertook to state a fact. I merely corrected him.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, Mr. President, if this is to be our mode of legislation, if river and harbor bills are to be constructed by a Committee of Commerce, if the State of Michigan can obtain an appropriation of $744,000, taking into consideration, as I want every Senator to do, her right to ask for it, and if other States are to be left entirely unprovided for in the bill, if when the bill reaches the Senate and the Committee on Commerce have the power, as they seemingly have in this body, to resist any just appropriation of money for any other portion of the country not named in their bill, then it is about time that the country understood it. I say, and I say it without meaning to be offensive to anybody, if there ever was such a thing as a swindle upon the country, it is the river and harbor bills that have been passed by Congress in the last five or six years. I do not criticise this one as any worse than the others, but I can not credit it with being any better.

Mr. President, I simply wish to call attention to this fact as the Senator from Mississippi was calling for an appropriation of money entirely out of proportion to the amount given to one single State, the appropriations for which I have read from the bill, and it was immediately objected to by the honorable chairman of the committee. We are informed that upon the Mississippi River a certain sum of money may be judiciously expended and can be during the present year; but every dollar asked for by the friends of the measure, by all the great States whose rivers drain into the Mississippi River and whose commerce and products are carried by its waters to the Gulf are opposed at every step by the Committee on Commerce. The answer is, "It will make the bill too large." But when we examine the bill we find that $744,000 to the State of Michigan is not too large.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, for a gentleman who never votes for an appropriation of a cent for rivers and harbors but condemns the whole system, even in his own State, where his people are beseeching the Committee on Commerce to make appropriations for them, and who repudiates their wishes, and by his action and by his votes tells his constituents that they have mistaken their business, the speech of the Senator from New Jersey is very characteristic and very amusing. When I took occasion to speak a while ago about the actual necessity of the Raritan River improvement to show what the committee thought in regard to it, the flash of lightning came clear across here to my seat from the Senator's eye because I opposed a little appropriation that would improve the tolls of a company in his State. I may say here that the whole State is threaded with monopolies that charge commerce and navigation and passengers and freights more tolls than any other State in the United States. That is the system on which they keep up their improvements there.

I am willing any Senator should attack an appropriation for the State of Michigan if he has read one line in regard to it, or can make one objection, or can show any impropriety in it in the least. I do not ask for a decent reason. I do not ask for a sufficient reason. I ask for a little shadow of a reason; and yet a grave Senator, without knowing what an appropriation is for in the whole list that he reads, attacks the amounts. Why, sir, on the Detroit River which he attacks in the first instance because it has $200,000 appropriated to it, there are 45,000 passages of vessels in the season of navigation of eight months —45,000, of an average tonnage exceeding five hundred to the vessel.

The daily passages over the lime-kiln obstructions in the Detroit River for which the appropriation is made are between two hundred and seventy-five and three hundred every day of the summer months. The great ships and propellers and barges bearing the whole commerce of the Northwest, Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, Northern Indiana, Northern Missouri pass down the great chain of lakes, and they all pass through this Detroit River.

The Senator thinks there is no water up there. He says more boats pass on the Raritan River than go into the harbor of New York. Sir, the entries and clearances in the harbor of New York are between thirteen and fourteen thousand in a year; and yet at the point where this obstruction of navigation exists in the Detroit River there are 45,000 passages of vessels in a year—in a year of eight months of navigation.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me right there for a question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I guess so.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not having criticised, as I distinctly disavowed my intention to do, the appropriation to the Detroit River, perhaps he will pass from that subject.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator commenced with that with a flashing in his eyes that first induced me to retire from the Chamber, and then my natural pluck called on me to remain and hear the attack which he had to make upon my Western State.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I said, if the Senator will bear with me again, in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, that I did not object to any suitable appropriation for the Detroit River, but one thing I did notice, that it was doubled over the amount as it came from the House.

Mr. CONGER. I ask leave to continue beyond the five minutes. I can not in five minutes say what I want to say and have the time occupied by the Senator whose time was extended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to extending the time of the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. I accept the apology of the Senator from New Jersey in regard to the Detroit River, and in behalf of the Senate I hope it may be accepted, and with all the humility, characteristic of him, with which the Senator made it.

I go to another thing, the item for Hay Lake Channel, the great channel which this Government has had surveyed and examined to make a straight and feasible channel from Lake Huron to the great canal at the Sault Falls, of $125,000. Sir, there is carried from Lake Superior in copper and iron alone every year more value than ever was seen on the Raritan River. Talk about the Raritan River and its little lot of skiffs and canal-boats! We know about that. Numbers swell up very large, but it is a kind of pony navigation; it pays toll. Our rivers of the West for many hundreds of miles of navigation, for great ships drawing sixteen feet of water, whenever the limestone across the Detroit River is removed, are free, free to the world, free to the East, free to the West, free to the North, and free to the South. Sir, we have lakes and harbors in the little inland State of Michigan into which we could bury New Jersey with its Raritan River far from human sight and knowledge. But we do not want to bury it there.

I read this morning in a paper that the whole coast of New Jersey was settling at the rate of four inches in a hundred years. With the settling of that coast the harbors will be deepened; with the settling of the coast the tide will run in on the Raritan and allow boats that draw six and five and four feet of water to get every hundred years four inches more.

Sir, on the theory of the Senator from New Jersey, voting forever and perpetually against any improvement of the interior navigation of the United States, the people of this country, if they adopted his views, would wait for this providential subsidence of the eastern coast, not that we might dig out and dredge and improve the navigation of the rivers, but that as the earth settled the water would come in and make deeper channels of communication; and that same spirit would wait for the subsidence of the coast of New Jersey to improve its harbors, for the Senator says he never has voted and never will vote for one of these river and harbor bills.

Sir, I thank God that he does not represent the intelligence, he does not represent the spirit of progress, he does not represent the demands of the people of the United States in this year or any other year of its existence. With his spirit there would have been no increase in the United States; with that spirit the great rivers and harbors of the West would have been without sails and without commerce and without settlement along their borders—a Sleepy Hollow sentiment that waits and waits and lets others vote appropriations to improve even one's own State. But I have stated all I desire upon that subject.

The Senator objects to the sum of $40,000 for the Saginaw River, $20,000 above Bay City and $20,000 below. There pass out of that harbor at the mouth of the Saginaw River 627,000,000 feet of lumber every year. Think of 627,000,000 feet of lumber! I could shingle New Jersey with it. [Laughter.] I could lay the rafts that go out of that river on all the waters of New Jersey upon which you could drive coaches without the water spattering up through the cracks. [Laughter.] The lumbermen of my State, in the forests cutting down the trees along the rivers and making the logs into lumber at the mills, every year manufacture 4,000,270,000 feet of lumber, and it all has to go out of these different harbors.

These harbors, to each of which is given five or ten or fifteen or twenty or forty thousand dollars, are of great importance. The money is used to remove bars between the lakes and the little interior mouths of the rivers, so that there may go these millions of feet of lumber out to supply the wants of the West and the South and the East. I need not dwell on the statistics of its wheat, the largest winter-wheat-growing State in the Union. Michigan is a little inland State! It is the seventh State in the Union in its wool production, but it is a little inland State! It is the eighth State in the Union in its production of cattle, and the eleventh in its production of horses, but it is a little inland State, that little Michigan of ours! Why, sir, New Jersey is a good deal of a State, but its whole production could not only be quadrupled but could be multiplied by twenty-five, old as it is and great as it is, and it does not begin to reach the magnitude of the productions of that little inland State of Michigan.

Now, sir, I invoke the Senator from New Jersey to look at his geography a little. The exhibition of to-day reminds me, as it does many of my fellows around me, that that branch of study has been sadly neglected. Sir, the coast line, following the large bays around the coast of Michigan where vessels drawing twelve feet of water can go around and approach the shore, is longer than that of any other State in this Union. We have bays there, that we do not call very large bays either, that have more coast line than all New Jersey. We have bays in Michigan in which, as I said before about our lakes, we can hide New Jersey from the eyes of man. Michigan is bounded by Lake Erie, Lake Saint Clair, Lake Huron, Lake Michigan, and Lake Superior. All but one of that magnificent chain of lakes that is the admiration of the world border on the State of Michigan. That it is productive, that it is fertile, that its mines exceed those of any other land, that its fisheries are the most productive of those of any State of this Union, that the amount of pine cut in that State exceeds that of any other two States in the Union, that it has for itself a great commerce can not be disputed by any one who has at all read its history.

But, sir, it happens that the Detroit River and the Saint Clair River and the Saint Mary River connecting those three great lakes, Superior and Huron and Erie, and the Straits of Mackinaw, connecting with Lake Michigan, all lie within the State of Michigan. Of the amount appropriated in this bill $573,000 are for works in which the State of Michigan is no more interested than New York or Pennsylvania or Ohio or Illinois or Wisconsin or Minnesota. These great expenditures are to improve the great natural highways, national highways, and unfortunately for the Senator from New Jersey he has attacked appropriations which are more purely national in their character and grand in their character than can be found in any other State in this Union. He has chosen that perhaps from a little pique because I made some remarks about the Raritan and the canal and the tolls imposed by the State of New Jersey, not only on canals but on everything else, and the Senator was offended. Sir, I do not blame him. I do not regret the exhibition of feeling he has shown here. I do not regret his announcement in attacking this bill that he opposes all river and harbor bills. I desire that the country shall know who opposes the progress unto destiny of this nation of ours. I desire the country to know who stands by railroad monopolies and refuses to improve the great highways of the people which are free to all. That question is crowding upon the consideration of the American people day by day. The people know well that the improvement of their water courses upon which the boat, the vessel, large or small, of any one of our citizens may float, carrying off to market the produce of others of our citizens, is the great restraint to-day and in all time will be upon such monopolies as can grind down the farmer and compel the disapproval of the agriculturist all over the land.

If I had time and could briefly review the history of our internal-improvement system in improving rivers and harbors, I could show you the waste places which have become settled and alive with industry and with immigration and with growth. If I had time I could show that just in proportion as these improvements have spread out through the States and up our rivers and along our lakes and along our coast the country has prospered—prospered beyond all example, infinitely beyond the meager appropriations which we have been compelled to dole out from year to year because we did not desire to make an appropriation bill for this purpose too great in any one year. Had I the time to explain even briefly these things I should give the whole history of the growth and the expansion and spreading out of our country from the East to the West, its harbors, its cities, its villages, its waste places made fruitful. I assert here—and I have studied that subject—without any fear of contradiction that just in proportion as the General Government has opened these larger and smaller highways of travel and the course of the natural channels of communication with which Providence has blessed our great country, in that same proportion the country has grown and prospered and become settled.

Sir, I have said that whatever sum—and I have not footed it up—the Senator from New Jersey charges as being appropriated to the State of Michigan, $570,000 of it by my list is for great national highways, for the straits in the rivers, for the channels through which the vessels of all the States pass freely. Why, sir, the lime-kiln obstruction in the Detroit River does not even lie in the State of Michigan. Half of that obstruction to be removed lies in the waters of Canada. The middle of the channel is the dividing line, and we had to make a treaty with Canada to get a right to deepen that part of the channel to make a great highway between the upper and the lower lakes, between the great West and the great East.

Ah, sir, considering the amount of cost, considering the great number and great amount of these appropriations which are for great national highways with which the State of Michigan has only to do because they pass along its borders on the boundary line between us and the Canadas, and considering that this appropriation is less than 6 per cent. of the whole appropriation in this bill, less than one-sixteenth of the whole, with all its great boundary of water and with all the States that are interested in it, I submit to the gentleman that he had better continue making his apologies for attacking the State of Michigan, and for myself it may be proper to say I will accept them most cheerfully and not renew again this discussion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I had desired at some time——

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment? I think perhaps I ought to say a word in reply to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOAR. I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question pending is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] upon which the Senator from New Jersey has already addressed the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to say only one word in reply to the Senator from Michigan, but if the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to hold the floor——

Mr. HOAR. I will hold the floor but yield to the Senator.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will not take more than a moment. I do not suppose the Senate expects me to reply to the Senator from Michigan in terms such as he has employed.

If any Senator will take up like appropriation bills in former years and will study carefully the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when such bills have been under consideration, he will find the speech of the Senator to-day. I have heard it and read it often. Perhaps the only misfortune about the matter, if there be any at all, is the fact that the Senator from New Jersey to-day has seen fit to attack the provisions of this bill in the case of the State of Michigan, which I think have been placed there, perhaps I may justly say, very largely through the influence of the distinguished gentleman himself upon the committee from that State.

But there is one thing I find the Senator is an adept in doing. Whenever he gets himself in a difficult position like the one he seems to be in to-day his only way out of it is by violent denunciation and extravagant gesticulation. He comes down to the front row in the Senate, and there he spreads the American eagle and denounces anybody and everybody who will not vote for river and harbor bills.

The Senator must not undertake to say that I am disappointed with the meager appropriation given to the State of New Jersey. I am entirely satisfied. I should be better satisfied, however, if the appropriations made for that State were in any measure proportioned to the appropriations given to the State of Michigan. I should be better satisfied if the appropriations made for other States were in some measure proportioned to the appropriations made for his State.

I will not undertake to reply to the Senator's so-called argument or speech. To do so would be to lose my own self-respect in a measure, and certainly the respect of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have desired at some time during the progress of this bill to express some views upon the general policy in regard to the improvement of the internal water ways of this country, and I am informed by the gentlemen who have the bill in charge that it would perhaps be more agreeable to them and more convenient to the Senate that I should take this opportunity.

I do not expect to address the Senate on the pending amendment to which alone the five-minute rule applies under the order, and I should like, therefore, to extend my remarks beyond five minutes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let the time be extended by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to express my views of the relation of the National Government to domestic commerce.

I am one of those persons who believe the powers conferred by the people on the National Government were created to be exercised. There is no economy in wasting strength. Nothing is so extravagant as suffering great public properties to remain unused. Great as have been the achievements of the American people in developing the resources of this continent for the use of man, there are far greater resources still unused, which the power of the nation alone is adequate to unfold. Nothing stands in the way of our contesting again with Great Britain her supremacy on the sea, of taking our rightful and leading place in supplying the markets of the world as well as bringing together the distant parts of our own territory, and multiplying many fold our agricultural and mineral wealth, but the want of a discreet and liberal exercise of the powers vested in Congress for this very purpose.

There are two difficulties which we encounter. The first is from that school of statesmanship which dreads and resists every exercise of the functions of government not absolutely necessary for the preservation of the state and the security of life and property. The other is from a widespread popular belief that this class of expenditures is dishonestly made. But the theory of the strict constructionist, however it may be vindicated by experience, in regard to many of the relations of government to the people is surely out of place here. Government has its police powers; it exercises its authority for restraint or for exaction over the individual human will. The use of such powers should be confined to the limits of absolute necessity. They become odious to those who are subjected to them. They are the instruments of tyranny and the temptation of ambition. Let these powers be limited by a construction as strict as may be compatible with the absolute safety of the state. The maxim "the world is governed too much" is the witness of the experience of mankind of their abuse.

But to the power to regulate commerce no such objection applies. It is wholly beneficent. It is a senseless and unreasoning fear which dreads putting forth the national strength in these great public works through which every artery and vein of commerce throbs with a new life. Surely if we can call the great inanimate forces of nature into the service of man we may rightfully avail ourselves of the united strength of the 50,000,000 who make up the Republic to build great public ways, to aid the railroad, to open the harbor on lake or ocean, to clear the channel of the great river for the commerce of the world. Under this generous and wise policy taxation itself, everywhere else a burden, becomes only a source of wealth. The agencies of destruction are turned to the protection of works enduring as the continent itself. The great engineers of the Army, relieved from the employments of war, turn their genius in a new direction—

> Bid the broad arch the dangerous flood contain
> The mole, projected, break the roaring main;
> Back to his bounds their subject sea command,
> And roll obedient rivers through the land—
> These honors peace to happy nations brings;
> These are imperial arts, and worthy kings.

If any construction of the Constitution can be considered as settled by legislative precedent, by general consent, and by the opinions of the great leaders and authorities of all parties, it is this: That the power to regulate commerce among the States has been vested by the Constitution in Congress as completely as it before existed in the States; that it includes the power to facilitate commerce by all appropriate public works; and that it is a power granted not for purposes of limitation or restraint, but as a beneficial power to be freely exercised. Mr. Calhoun, of all our statesmen the most jealous of national authority, declares in his report of June 26, 1846:

> It was not to limit or prohibit it as a power of a dangerous character. On the contrary, it was regarded as one of the utmost utility, and on the proper control of which the prosperity of the States essentially depended.

Mr. President, it is not from constitutional scruple that we hesitate to employ for the public advantage the beneficent forces which the Constitution places in our hands. It is the fear of a wild and unreasoning public outcry. I state the result of careful observation and of large experience in legislation here when I affirm my belief that Congress has not dared to deal with the question of restoring our carrying trade by sea, with the question of creating and maintaining a navy, or with this matter of developing our great internal public ways in the spirit of a true wisdom or a true economy. We have not only not dealt with them as other great nations deal with them, but we have not dealt with them on sound principles, as a private man with like interests and resources would deal with them.

Mr. Webster declared in 1824:

> High rank among the nations results more than from anything else from that military power which we can cause to be water-borne, and from that extent of commerce which we are able to maintain throughout the world. (See Webster, volume 3, page 134.)

The United States, with its 18,000 miles of seacoast, is no longer a naval power. Your flag carries with it no terror at sea, for you have neither guns nor ships of war to support it. You are not only without the means of making yourselves formidable by attack, but you could not without a long period of preparation defend your own coasts. It is not England or France, Italy or Spain only with whom you are bound over by your own weakness to keep the peace. You could not if you would have supported the policy of the last Secretary of State in regard to the American continent. It is doubtful if you had the naval force to prevent Chili from laying San Francisco under contribution in case she had resented our interference.

An eminent naval officer was called on to respond to the toast to the Navy at the meeting of the Army of the Potomac in this city last summer. I do not envy him if the report I have seen of his speech be true, as I have no reason to doubt, when he was compelled to answer the suggestion that we must depend on torpedoes and not on sailors for the safety of our chief cities:

> Rear-Admiral Rodgers, responding to the third toast, "The Navy," alluded to the co-operation of the naval with the land forces during the war. Speaking of the Navy of to-day, he said:
> "So far as I know, we have not even one good gun of modern caliber ashore or afloat, in the Army or the Navy. What is more, I fear we have no trained artisans nor any forges to make guns. Our old cannon are as obsolete as the flint-lock muskets of 1812, and we have not one efficient ship of war. England is at this moment building twelve great ironclads, France sixteen, and the Italians two of the largest ironclads in the world, and we, in this rich country, with its enormous seacoasts, have been standing idle."
> General ROSECRANS, who sat near the speaker, suggested that this country depended on torpedoes. Admiral Rodgers immediately took issue with him, and said that while torpedoes were not implements of warfare to be disregarded, they were an utterly unreliable power, and their greatest value is in their moral effect.

Mr. Webster declared at Charleston in June, 1825:

> We have a commerce that leaves no sea unexplored; navies which take no law from superior force.

Is this true of our 50,000,000 to-day?

The delusion that the absence of American shipping from the ocean is due to the rebel cruisers and the encouragement of rebel cruisers by Great Britain is refuted by statistics. In 1868, four years after the Alabama went down in the British Channel, the American registered tonnage was 1,565,732; in 1882 it had fallen to 1,292,294; a loss of 273,438. In 1858 the registered steam tonnage was (American) 221,939; in 1882, 154,570; a loss of 67,369.

The percentage of American, British, and total foreign tonnage entered at seaports of the United States from foreign countries was:

	1868.	1882.	Difference.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.

In 1856 the American percentage was 71.56; in 1861, 66.35; in 1882, 20.25.

The secretary of the National Board of Trade, from whom these statistics are taken, well says:

> A few years hence, unless adequate measures of relief shall be promptly applied, we shall have no carrying trade whatever upon any ocean; on the Atlantic we can hardly be said to have any now.

Great Britain owes the establishment and maintenance of her ocean steamship lines to a liberal system of subsidies. Even now when her great steamship lines are established in their command of the world's carrying trade she pays out for ocean mail service a considerable sum annually more than she receives in postage.

I do not fail to appreciate the gravity of other objections to a system of subsidies, nor do I deem it for the interest of the United States to maintain a large navy. Still less would I put myself in opposition to that wise and healthy public sentiment which demands a rigid economy in expenditure. No dollar of the public money should be taken from the Treasury unless for a purpose which would command the assent of the people when the facts and reasons were known. But the American people are entitled to have their great business interests dealt with by statesmen who are not constantly flinching and cringing; who are not afraid that their public and personal character can not stand against senseless imputations of dishonesty. If the Congress be a den of thieves let us abandon our Constitution. Certainly the Republic is a failure if it can not wield those national forces which are solely peaceful and beneficial because of the iniquity and corruption which must attend their exercise.

Who can doubt that a sovereign like the half-savage Peter the Great or like the accomplished Emperor of Brazil would largely increase the value of our product to the producer and reduce its cost to the consumer by moderate and judicious expenditure in removing the obstructions to transportation? What I complain of is not that we do not adopt the methods of other nations. Our own may be better. I do not now complain that we do not imitate Great Britain in the policy by which she has gained and preserved the sovereignty of the seas. I do not now complain that we do not create a navy. I am not at this moment complaining that we have neglected the lessons of our own experience and the conclusions of our wisest and most thorough investigators. But I demand that we shall consider all these things on their merits; that we shall treat them and discuss them and vote upon them as things that may be honestly done or honestly let alone. I would insert in the river and harbor bill no single item the public usefulness of which can not be made so clear in the report of the committee that it will command with substantial unanimity the support of those persons who will fairly and consistently give it their attention. If the American Congress shall be driven from its duty by fear of imputations upon its integrity it will go far toward a confession that such imputations are not undeserved.

We are a great producing and a great consuming country. We are not only great producers of raw material, but are and ought to be great manufacturers. While we aspire to our full share of the occupation of carrying for other nations this share will always be of far less importance than the carrying we do for ourselves. It is manifestly for our interest that our product should be of the greatest possible value to the producer and of the lowest possible cost to the consumer. In so far as we are ourselves consumers this is plainly true. It is equally true so far as we provide for the consumption of other nations. It is essential to our successful competition with other nations either as manufacturers or as producers of food that we should reduce very largely the cost of our product. There are two policies proposed for the accomplishment of this result. One is the reduction of wages. The other the reduction of the cost of transportation.

The reduction of wages whether on farm or in factory is wholly inadmissible. Upon their maintenance and increase depend not only the comfort of unnumbered American homes but, as I firmly believe, the destiny of the Republic itself. I will not accept the teachings of that political economy which would persuade me that the fate of the workingman everywhere is to toil for bare life. I shall despair of my country when I am compelled to believe in such a necessity. Comfortable homes, abundant food, education, leisure must be earned by the workingmen in whom Providence has vested the government of this country or it will perish.

The cost of transportation adds nothing to intrinsic value. It is pure tax. It is burden, and nothing but burden. Any course of legislation, any reasonable expenditure which tends to reduce or to annihilate it is wholly beneficial. So far as we can institute a policy which shall annihilate the great spaces of the country we inhabit we take from our chief rival, Great Britain, the advantage of her station on the sea. Surpassing her in everything else, compelling her to depend on us for food and for cotton, if we can make as nearly as possible our whole territory a seaboard by the improvement of our great and wonderful opportunities for internal water transportation, we can reduce her both in commerce and business future to a second rank.

The removal of the burden of the cost of transportation of food and material, important as it is to the rest of the country, is vital to New England, and especially to the State which I represent. She has to transport over vast spaces her food, her material, and her product. Bringing across the continent her food, her coal, her iron, her leather, her wool, and her cotton, she sends her product back across the continent to be sold in competition with the established industries and cheap labor of Europe on the one hand, and the rising home manufacture of the West and South on the other. Boston, of all the five great ports of export, is the farthest in distance from the producer. New England is the farthest in distance from the market of all the great manufacturing centers. The interest of New England is to make the percentage of the cost of transport on food and material and product as small as possible. That alone can give her equality.

The doctrine of internal improvement is a Massachusetts doctrine. She originated it. She has furnished its ablest and most zealous defenders. In a letter dated February 2, 1837, John Quincy Adams says:

> The great effort of my administration was to mature into a permanent and regular system the application of all the superfluous revenue of the Union to internal improvement; improvement which at this day would have afforded high wages and constant employment to hundreds of thousands of laborers and in which every dollar expended would have repaid itself fourfold in the enhanced value of the public lands. With this system in ten years from this day the surface of the whole Union would have been checkered over with railroads and canals. It may still be done, half a century later, and with the limping gait of State legislation and private adventure. I would have done it in the administration of the affairs of the nation; I had laid the foundation of it all by a resolution offered to the Senate in 1806, and adopted by that body under another's name. The Journals of the Senate are my vouchers. It called forth the first report of Albert Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, upon internal improvement.

This report of Albert Gallatin was made to the Senate on the 4th of April, 1808. Few of our state papers equal it in interest and importance. It embodies the opinions of John Quincy Adams, as he repeatedly declared. Gallatin's own authority is hardly inferior to that of Adams.

I give a brief abstract of Mr. Gallatin's report, which shows its far-reaching character:

> Whenever the annual expense of transportation on a certain route in its natural state exceeds the interest on the capital employed in improving the communication and the annual expense of transportation (exclusively of the tolls) by the improved route, the difference is an annual additional income to the nation.

It makes no difference whether the tolls pay the interest on the cost or not.

> The general gain is not confined to the difference between the expenses of the transportation of those articles which had formerly been conveyed by that route, but many which were brought to market by other channels will then find a new and more advantageous direction; and those which on account of their distance or weight could not be transported in any manner whatever, will acquire a value and become a clear addition to the national wealth.

Private capital will not answer.

First. Capital is so in demand that it is not readily subscribed to objects whose profit is remote. Less sums than needed being subscribed at first, work proceeds slowly and interest lost.

Second. One canal comparatively useless until others beyond completed too extensive or distant to be embraced by the same individuals.

The General Government alone can remove these obstacles, and thereby reduce expense to the lowest rate.

Good roads and canals chief strengtheners of the Union.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

First. A series of great canals along the Atlantic coast completing a tide-water inland navigation from Boston to Saint Mary's, Ga., then the southeastern extremity of the territory of the United States.

Second. Communication between Atlantic and Western rivers.

Four artificial roads.

Improvement of navigation of Atlantic rivers by canals, &c.

Louisville Canal.

Also, in future canal from Mississippi River to Atlantic, cost, $10,000,000.

Third. Communications between Atlantic rivers and Saint Lawrence and lakes.

Fourth. Interior canals.

Fifth. Turnpike and artificial roads.

Mr. Gallatin estimates the cost of all these works, which he deems "of national and first-rate importance" and which he says "seem in the first instance to claim the support of the General Government," at $20,000,000. This does not include the cost of a canal from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic to be accomplished later at an estimated cost of $10,000,000.

In view of the ferocity of some modern criticisms, it is interesting to read the following suggestions from Mr. Jefferson's great financial secretary:

> The great geographical features of the country have been solely adhered to in pointing out those lines of communication; and these appear to embrace all the great interests of the Union and to be calculated to diffuse and increase the national wealth in a very general way by opening an intercourse between the remotest extremes of the United States. Yet it must necessarily result from an adherence to that principle that those parts of the Atlantic States through which the great Western and Northwestern communications will be carried must, in addition to the general advantages in which they will participate, receive from those communications greater local and immediate benefits than the Eastern, and perhaps Southern States. As the expense must be defrayed from the general funds of the Union, justice, and perhaps policy not less than justice, seem to require that a number of local improvements, sufficient to equalize the advantages, should also be undertaken in those States, parts of States, or districts which are less immediately interested in those inland communications. Arithmetical precision can not, indeed, be obtained in objects of that kind; nor would an apportionment of the moneys applied according to the population of each State be either just or practicable, since roads, and particularly canals, are often of greater utility to the States which they unite than to those through which they pass. But a sufficient number of local improvements, consisting either of roads or canals, may, without any material difficulty, be selected so as to do substantial justice and give general satisfaction. Without pretending to suggest what would be the additional sum necessary for that object, it will, for the sake of round numbers, be estimated at $3,400,000.

These expenditures which, not including ten millions for the canal from the Mississippi to the Atlantic, amount in all to $20,000,000, Mr. Gallatin proposes to defray by an annual appropriation of $2,000,000, extending over a period of ten years.

Mr. Gallatin estimates the annual permanent revenue of the United States from 1809 to 1815 at fourteen millions, and the necessary annual expenditure on the peace establishment at eight millions and a half, including forty-six hundred thousand for principal and interest of the public debt.

It will be seen, therefore, that he proposes an expenditure for internal improvements alone, not reckoning any sum devoted to harbors either on the ocean or the lakes, equal to 14 per cent. of the entire national income, and equal to about 25 per cent. of the sum expended by the nation for all other purposes, and to more than 50 per cent. of the expenditure for all other purposes, exclusive of the public debt. The actual expenditure fell far short of Mr. Gallatin's estimate, being but fifty-three hundred and eleven thousand in 1810 for all purposes other than the debt.

If we were to expend the same proportion of our revenue on this object to-day, as was proposed by Gallatin in 1808, we should have devoted fifty-six and a half millions in 1882 to internal improvements alone.

Mr. Adams repeatedly records in his diary his unchanged opinion upon this question.

June 25, 1830, he says:

> I have cherished the principle and the system of internal improvement under a conviction that it was for this nation the only path to increasing comfort and well-being, to honor, to glory, and finally to the general improvement of the condition of mankind. This system has had its fluctuations from the time of the establishment of the present Constitution of the United States. During the administration of Mr. Monroe it was constantly acquiring strength in Congress and in the public opinion. It was then favored by Calhoun and Lowndes, both of whom had hopes of rising upon it, and with them the State of South Carolina was devoted to it. The combination in Congress became by this means so strong that it overpowered the resistance of Mr. Monroe and produced the act of Congress of April, 1824. The slaveholders of the South have since discovered that it will operate against their interests. The cause will no doubt survive me, and if the Union is destined to continue it will no doubt ultimately triumph.

December 20, 1831:

> On my way home from the House I stopped at the Treasury and had an hour of conversation with the Secretary. I told him I should propose to reserve as much as five millions a year to purposes of internal improvement.

January 6, 1832, conversation with General Adair:

> He spoke with contempt of the mania for internal improvements, which, he said, was a raging disease throughout the country. I said I was much affected with the disease myself.

December 22, 1824, conversation with James Barbour:

> As to internal improvements my opinions had been published in most of the newspapers in extracts of letters from me, and had no doubt been seen by him. Since the act of Congress establishing the Cumberland road there had been no constitutional question worth disputing about involved in the discussion. It was certainly a great power to be exercised by Congress, and perhaps liable to great abuses. So were all the other great powers of Congress; and the control over it was in the organization of the Government, the elective franchise, the State authorities, and the good sense and firmness of the people.

December 27, 1831:

> I said I was no worshiper of the tariff, but of internal improvement, for the pursuit of which by Congress as a system I claimed to be the first mover. It was by a resolution which I offered to the Senate of the United States on the 23d of February, 1807.

July 30, 1834:

> My own system of administration was to make the national domain the inexhaustible fund for progressing and increasing internal improvement.

Mr. Adams charges that the slaveholders thought the policy of internal improvement adverse to their interest, and that their opposition caused its failure. But, however this may be, the greatest of our early statesmen fully coincided with his opinions.

Mr. Clay thought if Congress did not exercise the power there would be a division of the Union by the line of the Alleghany Mountains.

Mr. Madison did not find in the Constitution powers as extensive as he thought desirable for the purpose, but eagerly urged an amendment of the Constitution to supply the needed authority.

In his message of December 23, 1811, communicating to Congress the act of the State of New York in reference to the Erie Canal, he says:

> The utility of canal navigation is universally admitted. It is no less certain that scarcely any country offers more extensive opportunities for that branch of improvements than the United States, and none perhaps inducements equally persuasive to make the most of them. The particular undertaking contemplated by the State of New York, which marks an honorable spirit of enterprise and comprises objects of national as well as more limited importance, will secure the attention of Congress to the signal advantages to be derived to the United States from a general system of internal communication and conveyance, and suggest to their consideration whatever steps may be proper on their part toward its introduction and accomplishment. As some of these advantages have an intimate connection with the arrangements and exertions for the general security, it is at a period calling for these that the merits of such a system will be seen in their strongest lights.
> In his seventh and eighth annual messages Mr. Madison reiterates his urgent desire that Congress shall establish the roads and canals "which can best be executed under the national authority." "No objects," he declares, "within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expense bestowed upon them; there are none the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that more do honor to the Government whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. While the States individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring a national jurisdiction and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so excellent a work. And it is a happy reflection that any defect of constitutional authority which may be encountered can be supplied in a mode which the Constitution itself has providently pointed out.

Mr. Monroe in his first inaugural advocates with great earnestness the completion by national authority of the system of communication for which nature, in the great rivers, bays, and lakes, had done so much. He expresses no doubt of the constitutional authority, unless it be conveyed by the phrase "proceeding always with a constitutional sanction." He returns to the subject in his last annual message. But in his veto of the Cumberland road bill, on the 4th of May, 1822, he announced his reluctant conclusion that the existing powers of Congress are not sufficient, and recommends an amendment to the Constitution to confer the needed power.

Mr. Jefferson held like opinions. He thought the defect might be cured by special legislation by each State confirming the acts of Congress for works within its limits, and prepared a form for such enactment. In his last annual message he indicates a probable surplus revenue of more than $8,000,000, which he proposes shall, instead of being reduced—

> Be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States.

When Mr. Gallatin's report was made there was no State in the Union west of the Mississippi. There were but two States, Tennessee and Kentucky, which touched that river on the east. Florida was in the possession of Spain. The entire population of the United States at the last preceding census was but fifty-three hundred thousand, and at the next following but seventy-two hundred thousand. Manufacture was in its infancy. The production of cotton was less than one-seventieth its present amount. That of grain, compared with its present product of twelve hundred and fifty million in value, of iron with its present product of five thousand five hundred millions of pounds, of coal with its present product of fifty-nine millions of tons, would probably bear even smaller proportions. As has been already said, Mr. Gallatin expected a revenue of fourteen millions of dollars, affording a surplus of five and a half millions, a trifling sum when compared with our present receipts of $400,000,000.

Let it be remembered that the expenditure thus proposed by these early statesmen was for internal improvement alone—for rivers, canals, and roads—an expenditure for the service only of domestic commerce, including nothing for light-houses or harbors on the coast. John Quincy Adams would have had a nation of six or seven million people give five million annually from its revenue of fourteen million. Jefferson would have it give annually eight million from its revenue of eighteen million to the territory east of the Mississippi for purposes for which the much-abused bill of 1882 expended exclusive of the Mississippi River but five and a half million from our income of four hundred million for the entire continent.

I suppose we may fairly claim that any doctrine upon which, from 1806 to 1848, when Adams died, Daniel Webster and John Quincy Adams were agreed was a Massachusetts doctrine.

To exhibit Mr. Webster's views on the policy of liberal expenditure for internal communications by the General Government would be almost to set forth his whole theory as a constitutional statesman. He was born in the last year of the Revolutionary war. His public life began at the beginning of the war of 1812, when the infant Republic, with its population scarcely exceeding 7,000,000, was an object of undisguised contempt to every leading power on earth. Yet the present greatness of the country is not seen by our own vision to-day more clearly than it appeared then to that of Daniel Webster. With the eye of a prophet and the comprehension of a statesman he saw from the beginning the vast and beneficent power of these unused national forces. He never separated from the blessings of constitutional liberty itself the benefits to be derived from commerce as developed by these great national works of internal improvement. He never omits to urge this theme when the occasion makes it proper.

In his Plymouth Rock address he dwells on this as following the establishment of national government.

Again, in his speech before the Massachusetts election, in 1825, he calls on his fellow-citizens, "speaking," as he says, "perhaps at some hazard of misinterpretation," by united counsels and united efforts to aid the West in clearing the navigation of its mighty streams, and the South to push the production and augment the prices of its great staples.

At the public dinner given him in Faneuil Hall, in 1828, at the outset of his service in the Senate, he again calls the attention of his constituents to this subject as one of great and growing importance. He showed them that with the close of the war in Europe the great harvest which they had reaped as neutrals was over, other nations were now to raise their own bread, and as far as possible transport their own commodities. It was fit to consider how far home productions could properly be made to furnish activity to home supply and of the highest importance to inquire what means existed of establishing free and cheap intercourse between distant ports, thereby bringing the raw material abounding in one under the action of the productive labor which was found in another. He points out that from the very first assembling of Congress the power to regulate commerce has been construed to comprehend such measures as were necessary for its support, its improvement, its advancement, and justified the expenditure of money for the construction of piers, beacons, and light-houses and the clearing out of harbors. It was not easy to see why like expenditures might not be justified when made on internal objects.

> The vast regions of the West are penetrated by rivers to which those of Europe are but as rills and brooks. The navigation of those noble streams, washing as they do the margins of one-third of the States of the Union, is obstructed by obstacles capable of being removed, and yet not likely to be removed but by the power of the General Government. Was this a justifiable object of expenditure from the National Government? Without hesitation I have thought it was.

He goes on to urge that these objects are much less local than they seem:

> If the mouths of the Southern rivers be deepened and improved, the neighboring cities are benefited, but so also are the ships which visit them; and if the Mississippi and Ohio be rendered more safe for navigation, the great markets of consumption along their shores are the more readily and cheaply approached by the products of the factories and fisheries of New England.

He renews the subject at New York, and again at Worcester, and again at Pittsburgh, and again at Albany, and again at Bangor, and again at Madison, Ind. He meets the objection that the advantages received from this policy are local. "In such cases it always appeared to me that the point to be examined was, whether the principle was general. If the principle were general, although the application might be partial, I cheerfully and zealously gave it my support." Mr. Webster's speech at the Philadelphia banquet December 2, 1845, in reply to President Polk's message vetoing the river and harbor bill of that year, hardly needs the change of a sentence to adapt it to the question as it has come up at the present day.

President Polk had vetoed a bill which appropriated $1,300,000 for river and harbor improvement. Of this but $280,000 was for works on the Atlantic, leaving more than a million for lake and river. Considering that we were then at war, considering the vast increase in the population, the vast accession of territory, the gigantic development of our internal commerce which has taken place in the last forty years, that sum was a greater sum in proportion to the need or the ability of the country than the expenditure for like objects proposed by any recent bill. The arguments that Mr. Webster then combated and overthrew were the same which in infinitely feebler forms have been reproduced at the present day. The charge that the objects provided for were local, the imputation upon members of Congress as an offense that they desired to divide the benefits of this bill among different sections of the country with some regard to equality, even the silly jeers at uncouth and unfamiliar names of rivers and creeks, were rife then as now. Little Sodus Bay and Great Sodus Bay and Conneaut Creek and Ocracoke Inlet were as unfamiliar to the people in general then as Chehalis and Cohansey are to-day. This speech at the Philadelphia dinner is one of the very greatest of Mr. Webster's political speeches. It never should be and never will be forgotten. Its weighty and compact argument can not with justice be abridged.

I have elsewhere quoted the magnificent passage in the reply to Hayne, where Mr. Webster demands for himself and for New England the praise of having uniformly supported the most liberal grants from the public Treasury for the improvement of Western rivers. He there claims, as he had claimed in the first speech on Foot's resolution, that everything of this kind that had been accomplished had depended on New England for its success. It is true of that great speech as it is true of Mr. Webster's entire public efforts taken as a whole from the beginning of his career that with the exception of his vindication of the supreme authority of the Union, there is no single public object upon which he lays so much stress or for which he manifests such zeal as this of internal improvement. He declares that he had proposed to himself this object of effort at the outset of his Congressional service.

He re-enforces his argument from the Constitution by the consideration that the Government is a great untaxed landed proprietor. It was with Webster's authority that Sumner silenced the storm of opposition which his first great speech in Congress encountered for which he was threatened with legislative censure for advocating the support of internal improvements in the West by liberal grants of public land.

Mr. Webster dealt with this subject many times in speeches not found in his collected works. His speech on the purchase of stock in the Louisville Canal is published in the volumes compiled by Mr. Everett under his direction. That is one of the most Websterian of Webster's speeches. There is not a sentence of it that does not seem to bring its great author before our eyes:

> There are no Alleghanies in my politics. I have taken a part in this great struggle for internal improvement from the beginning and I shall hold out to the end. Whoever may follow, or whoever may fly, I shall go straight forward for all those constitutional powers, and for all that liberal policy which I have hitherto supported. These Western gentlemen who are so much interested in this measure have stood by us and now I tell them that I shall stand by them. I shall be found where they look for me. I have asked their votes once and again for objects important to the Atlantic States. They have liberally given those votes. And now having an object interesting to them and their constituents, a first object and a great object, they have a right to find me at their side, acting with them, acting according to my own principles and proving my own consistency. And so they shall find me. And so they do find me. On this occasion I am with them; I am one of them. I am as Western a man on this bill as he among them who is most Western. This chair must change its occupant, another voice will address the Senate from this seat, before an object of this nature, so important, so constitutional, so expedient, so highly desirable to a great portion of the country, and so useful to the whole, shall fail here for the want, either of a decisive vote in its support, or of an earnest recommendation of it to the support of others.

Adams and Gallatin and Webster were not accustomed to expend their strength on what was temporary or transitory. Constitutional principles have not changed since their day. The policy which each of them in turn urged upon his countrymen, and reckoned as among his most important titles to their favor, was not for a single year or a single generation. It was never more expedient than to-day. I wish to urge upon Congress the wisdom of expending upon the internal water ways of the country a sum at least equal to that which Adams and Gallatin proposed. I think no river and harbor bill should contain a smaller appropriation for the rivers and lakes of our present dominion, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, than that which Gallatin and Adams proposed for a people of seven millions, whose revenue was but fourteen millions, whose territory was not inhabited half-way from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, who had but two States touching that river, who navigated but two of the five great lakes, to whom steam as a motive power was scarcely known.

The sum which the river and harbor bill of 1882, the object of so much senseless and unreasoning clamor, appropriated for our entire river improvements, exclusive of the Mississippi and Missouri, slightly exceeded $5,000,000. I propose to state the reasons why this expenditure should be maintained and made permanent. It costs the American people 10 cents apiece. It is but a grain of mustard-seed compared with the vast advantage to our foreign commerce and the advantage, much more vast, to our domestic commerce. Judiciously applied it will increase the value of every grain-field in the West and every cotton-field in the South. Every householder in New England will feel the diminution it will cause in the price of his food—will save more than his share of the cost in the price of his meat and his flour.

If there be anything to which the Republicans of the country and of my own State are pledged it is this. They have repeatedly and emphatically reiterated their allegiance to a liberal policy of internal improvement from their earliest organization.

Since Gallatin made his famous report and since Adams left the Senate more than 120,000 miles of railroads have been erected for the service of American commerce. To aid them large public grants of land and credit have been made. These have removed the necessity for many of the works contemplated by our early statesmen. But the reasons for liberal appropriation for internal water communication have been strengthened and not weakened. Another necessity, new and more imperious, has been created. Great as has been the increase of the means of transportation, the demand for that increase has grown in far greater proportion. To maintain our rivalry with foreign nations abroad, to secure the independence of our own manufactures, to develop a productive capacity undreamed of by our predecessors, to keep up the rate of wages on which republicanism itself is dependent, all require the reduction to the lowest possible point of the cost of transportation. But to hold in check the great railroad power itself, to prevent it from fixing both rates of carriage and prices of production from becoming independent of competition and of the ordinary laws of trade, we must improve and develop to the fullest extent our great natural water ways.

The census, the reports of the boards of trade of our chief cities, of the great railroads and canals, and especially Mr. Windom's masterly state paper on transportation routes to the seaboard, and the admirable reports on internal commerce by Mr. Nimmo are all full of instruction. There are some conclusions upon which all the leading authorities are agreed from which we may derive much light.

First, all the authorities and the experience of this country and Europe unite in teaching us that competition or the law of supply and demand do not operate to protect the public against excessive freight charges by railroads as in the case of free highways. The whole railroad system of a country becomes, sooner or later, a unit for the purpose of fixing the price of transport of merchandise. Mr. Nimmo in his report on internal commerce for July, 1881, page 17, states the conclusion as follows:

> Competition between common carriers on free highways and the law of supply and demand have from time immemorial been regarded as the natural and adequate regulative principles with respect to freight charges. An agreement as to the establishment and maintenance of rates among any number of carriers on a free highway of commerce does not of course preclude the possibility of competition upon such highway; but the case is different with respect to the establishment and maintenance of competing railroads. In the latter case the agreements are not made by individual carriers, but by the owners of the highways of commerce themselves together with all their organized agencies for transportation.

This is established by most abundant proof. Mr. Randolph, Secretary of the Chicago Board of Trade (Nimmo's report, 1880, appendix, pages 3–5) gives an instructive history of the establishment of rates by the joint executive committee of the East and West lines of railroad in 1879.

Their first rate, established June 23, 1879, was on the basis of 20 cents per one hundred pounds from Chicago to New York. This was a large advance on previous summer rates, which rates had proved amply remunerative and had enabled the roads to pay good dividends and improve their roads and equipment. When the arrangement was found to operate in forty days, on August 4 the rate was advanced 25 per cent. By August 25 it was advanced 50 per cent., by October 13, 75 per cent.; and by November 10, 100 per cent., or to 40 cents per 100 pounds. This was without any essential modification of local rates. This was maintained till the opening of lake navigation in the spring of 1880, when it was reduced to 35 cents, and April 14, 1880, to 30 cents. Thirty cents per 100 pounds is an average of 6¼ mills per ton per mile. The average cost of moving all freight, local and through, of all classes, grain being but fourth class, was, in 1879, 4.86 mills per ton per mile and for the following year even less.

Mr. Windom's committee establish this conclusion beyond controversy by their history of railroad transportation in Great Britain, France, Belgium, Prussia, and in this country. (Windom's report, pages 111–118.)

Second. All the authorities are in substance agreed that it is impossible to control the railroads in the matter of rates by the direct exercise of the authority of Government. Mr. Windom declares, as the result of the attempts to prevent combinations and consolidations in England, that for more than a third of a century the failure has been complete. (Report, page 126.) The railroad commissioners of Massachusetts declare "that the English legislation has neither accomplished anything which it sought to bring about nor prevented anything it sought to hinder."

Third. Competition, which is to secure and maintain cheap transportation, must embrace two essential conditions: First, it must be controlled by a power with which combination will be impossible; second, it must operate through cheaper and more ample channels of commerce than are now provided. (Windom, page 242.)

Two methods of accomplishing this desired result have been suggested. One is the construction and operation by the Government of one or more railroad lines which will regulate all others. The other is the improvement of our great natural channels of water communication, their connection by canals and short railway portages where needed, with such suitable and reasonable expenditure upon harbors, rivers, and creeks as shall be necessary to render them accessible.

The first of these methods was once recommended to the people of Massachusetts, who were advised to buy and operate the Fitchburg Railroad. The Windom committee speak respectfully of the plan of constructing by the United States one or more double-track freight railroads to be controlled by the Government and operated at a low speed. They do not recommend this plan. But they say that such roads—

> Would be able to carry at much less cost than can be done under the present system of operating fast and slow trains on the same road; and, being incapable of entering into combinations, would no doubt serve as a very valuable regulator of all existing railroads within their influence.

But the practical objections to this scheme are of such a nature that I think it highly improbable that the American people will ever be brought to approve it. It will require a large original outlay. It demands a very large force of employés to be controlled by each successive administration. This force will be, or will at least be believed to be, a great political instrumentality. It makes the Government a rival and competitor of large business associations. Government railroads not being managed with a view to profit, there will be no stimulant in the desire of gain to develop the resources of the country by the construction of branch lines and feeders. It may be doubted whether the Government railroad will always be able to defend itself against its powerful rivals who themselves, so far as they can wield political power, can get a share in its management. The final executive control of a Government railroad is by no means certain to be in the hands that are fitted for its management. The location and the management of a great railroad must necessarily have great but varying and unequal effect on the prosperity of different communities. This would cause constant jealousies and complaints. It would not long be tolerated that the resources of the Government, to which all equally contribute, should be expended unequally. This complaint could never be removed until the Government undertook to supply transportation for every part of the country.

The second of these methods is recommended by the concurrent authority of the ablest men, whether statesmen or experts, who have investigated the subject, and by the marvelous results it has already accomplished.

Government, in the promotion of commerce with foreign nations or among the States by providing safe and convenient routes of transport, has two classes of objects which demand its attention. First, are the great arteries of traffic such as the Mississippi River, the lakes, the great routes which connect centers of trade like Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Milwaukee, Louisville, with New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans. The Atlantic Ocean also, the great highway of nations, is a great carrier also for local commerce, and its competition is felt in lowering freights on many of our important railroads.

Second, are special but important localities which need the national resources to make them a part of the great system. Such are in my own State, Lynn, Taunton, the towns and cities on Charles River. The principle on which these are to be aided should be carefully limited. But the commerce of each of them with other States and with other countries is a national concern. It can be developed only by the national authority. As I shall hereafter show, the aggregate of such expenditure will produce a thousand-fold return in national wealth and benefit.

The river or lake or ocean is free to all mankind. There can be no monopoly in its use. No combination can control it or secure any advantage in its benefits. When it is once prepared for the service of commerce it is permanent and does not perish with the using. Even in its competition with the railroad it takes but a small portion of the entire freight; it is the perpetual, sure, and inevitable regulator of rates. There is no practical limit to the carrying capacity of national navigable waters, while the railroad is limited by the frequency with which trains can be run and by the terminal facilities. Another fact is well settled by modern experience:

The cost of water transportation diminishes in proportion as the size of vessels increases. The value of any water route is measured by the capacity and efficiency of its most defective part. If from lack of proper improvements a single harbor on any given line can afford facilities for only the smaller class of vessels the value of the entire line is graded down to correspond with the inadequate harbor.—Secretary Windom's letter to lake improvement convention at Saint Paul, December, 1878.

Let us see for a moment how the public expenditure in the improvement of our great water ways and their increased competition with the railroads has already diminished the cost of transportation in the single article of wheat. This diminution of the cost of transportation diminishes the price to the consumer, while it increases it to the producer. The diminution of freights causes the increase of our supply of breadstuffs to Europe. That not only enables our farmers to dispose of a larger quantity of their product abroad, but diminishes the price there. The price abroad determines the price here. So that by diminishing freight we diminish the cost of the food of the American workman of the Eastern States, while the American farmer is enabled to supply Europe. Formerly the farm was an isolated and independent homestead. The farmer raised the larger part of what he consumed, and consumed nearly everything he raised. To-day the American farmer is a merchant, whose competitor is on the Ganges or the Bosporus.

Among the chief objects of internal improvements in the bill which Mr. Webster defended against the veto of President Polk was the Mississippi River, whose perilous navigation the great orator so impressively describes. The wise liberality of the National Government has already much improved the channel of this stream from Saint Louis to New Orleans, and has enabled the river itself, compelled by the genius of a great engineer, to cut a passage through the obstruction at its mouth.

Steamers of 6,000 tons, drawing thirty feet of water, now pass freely in and out of New Orleans, where but a few years ago vessels of twenty feet draught were unable to pass, except at uncertain intervals and after long detentions. I feel no little personal gratification that I have been able to contribute something to this result. From a time before the adoption of the Constitution the charge has been made against the people of the Northeast that they desired to compel all the commerce of the Northwest to seek an eastern outlet, and were hostile to the acquisition of the right to navigate the Mississippi, and to the improvement of that navigation after the river itself became ours. Washington, in his Farewell Address, assured the people of the West how unfounded was this suspicion. But it has been kept alive down to our own day. It played its evil part in hurling John Quincy Adams from power. I hope the jetties which opened the mouth of the Mississippi, constructed by the aid of New England votes, may forever perform their beneficent office.

The jetties were completed in 1879. In that year the wheat and wheat-flour and corn and corn-meal shipped to foreign countries from New Orleans was 5,920,487 bushels as against 5,170,406 bushels in 1856. In 1882 it had gone up to 16,859,343 bushels. This consisted entirely of grain received at New Orleans from Saint Louis, and is declared by Mr. Nimmo in his report for 1882 to be largely the result of the jetties. Vessels drawing thirty feet and carrying 6,000 tons now pass in and out of New Orleans as freely and punctually as they can traverse the open Gulf.

The vice-president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Mr. King, in his report to the joint executive committee of the East and West trunk lines, dated April 27, 1881, states the total charges for transporting grain from Saint Louis to Liverpool, via New Orleans, to be 28 cents per bushel, while at the same time the charge via New York was 36¼ cents per bushel. These rates include all charges. At the time Mr. King refers to the river rate from Saint Louis to New Orleans was 8½ cents per bushel. Here, then, is a saving of 8¼ cents per bushel on the transportation of grain from Saint Louis to Liverpool caused by the improvement in the Mississippi navigation. But the instrumentalities for transporting grain by the Mississippi were not completely organized at the date of these statistics. Mr. Nimmo says that well-informed persons believe that grain can thus be transported at a profit from Saint Louis to New Orleans at 4 cents a bushel. This would make a total diminution of 12¾ cents per bushel. But, keeping within the possibility of doubt, let us ascribe a saving of 10 cents per bushel only to this one improvement in water communication and see its important consequences.

We exported in 1881 150,565,467 bushels of wheat alone. An annual saving of 10 cents per bushel is a saving of $15,000,000 annually of export tax on the one article of wheat.

We exported in 1872, the year when the transportation of grain to the Atlantic from points as far west as Chicago fairly began—

	1872.	1880.
Wheat.....bushels...	26,423,080	153,252,795
Wheat-flour.....barrels...	2,514,535	6,011,419
Indian corn.....bushels...	34,491,650	98,169,877

The total export of wheat and corn increased from 63,429,165 bushels in 1872 to 279,707,808 bushels in 1880. On this is an annual saving of $27,000,000.

This increase in exportation—

Says Mr. Nimmo—

of the cereal products of the country constitutes one of the most striking developments of commerce ever recorded.

He further says:

The reduction which has taken place during the past four years in the cost of transportation between the West and the seaboard has had a marked effect in reducing the export price of corn and of certain other agricultural products of the West, and has been one of the principal causes of the rapid increase in the exportation of the products of agriculture to foreign countries.

In 1872 there was imported from the United States into Great Britain and Ireland of wheat and wheat-flour 17,984,118 bushels, being 20.2 per cent. of their whole importation. In 1880 there was imported from the United States, of the same, 83,487,243 bushels, being 65.4 per cent of the whole importation. The whole importation increased from 58,877,406 bushels in 1872 to 127,746,325 bushels in 1880. So that Great Britain got from abroad 40,000,000 bushels more in '80 than in '72, and the United States supplied 65.4 per cent. of the large importation against 20.2 per cent. of the smaller. We are therefore not only driving Russia and other food-producing countries from the British market, but driving the British farmer from his own. Russia, which in 1872 imported into the United Kingdom 33,486,091 bushels of wheat, in 1879 imported but 15,162,639, and in 1880, 5,376,202.

This large increase in the total quantity of wheat imported into the United Kingdom—is due not so much to the increase of population in that country as to the decreased production of wheat in England. Cheaper transportation from points of production has enabled American producers to compete with English producers more successfully than formerly.

Mr. Windom estimates the saving which will be made on the corn and wheat crops of Iowa and Minnesota alone at $36,000,000. (Report, pages 212, 214, 215.)

Wheat is by no means the only article which exhibits these marvelous results of the reduction of the export tax. The consumption of corn increased in Great Britain from 16,000,000 bushels in 1860 to over 74,000,000 in 1879, the price diminishing from 97 cents in 1860 to 66 in 1879.

The reduction—

in the cost of transportation in the United States from the Western and Northwestern States to the seaboard during the last six years has tended greatly to increase the exportation of both wheat and corn to Europe, and especially to the United Kingdom.

The cost of transporting wheat from Chicago to New York city by lake and canal fell from an average of 24.25 cents per bushel, not including canal tolls of 3.1 cents per bushel, in 1872 to an average of 12.22 cents per bushel, including canal tolls of 1.03 cents per bushel, in 1880.

New York within the past twelve months has made to the commerce of the country the magnificent contribution of her canal property of a hundred millions in value, that these canal tolls may be saved.

Such, Mr. President, are the marvelous results of the liberal policy commended to us by the great statesmen of the last generation, as shown in the export of the article of breadstuffs alone. We are but beginning to reap this precious harvest. The amount of this export is and will be fluctuating from a variety of well-known causes. But the law of its increase is fairly seen in the facts which I have stated. It is not merely the saving in the burden of freights that is the result of our improved means of communication, ample as that is to justify a far greater expenditure than we have ever made or even proposed. It is the possibility of selling this vast product at all which our improved communication has created. It is not the annual saving of fifteen millions of freights, but it is the production and sale to Great Britain of one hundred and twenty-five million dollars' worth of food that in the article of wheat alone our cheap lines of transport has made possible.

Our chief articles of export are breadstuffs, cotton, provisions, including live animals, and illuminating-oils. Of these we exported in 1883 nearly $700,000,000 in value. Our export must be expected to be constantly on the increase. It amounted to $219,932,650 in the first three months of 1883, against $179,829,859 in the corresponding period of 1882. We are not subjected to the same close rivalry in the articles of cotton and illuminating-oils as in breadstuffs and provisions. But the saving in freight is as important as is the large if not equal saving on the domestic freights of the imports from abroad in the process of their distribution to the homes and places of labor where they are consumed. I do not know that political economy has settled the question what proportion of a tax like that of transportation or a duty on imports falls on the producer and what on the consumer. But it is surely far within bounds to say that a general reduction in freights equal to that which saves ten cents a bushel on wheat for its transport from the centre of its production to the seaboard would work a total saving to the American people in the articles which are the subjects of our foreign commerce of at least ninety millions annually.

It is impossible within the limits of a single speech to state one in a hundred of the striking instances of the reduction of railroad freights by the improvement of the means of water transportation. This influence is, of course, chiefly confined to bulky articles such as breadstuffs, coal, lime, clay, stone, minerals, lumber, cotton, where the necessities of commerce do not demand high rates of speed, and where the freight is a large proportion of the value.

Mr. Nimmo declares that the regulating influence of the two great water lines—the lakes and the Mississippi—is felt throughout the entire Western and Northwestern States and Territories. The growth of Chicago is due to the fact that it is the most important center in this country of a railroad system, subject to the regulating influence of cheap water lines to the seaboard.

Mr. Nimmo sums up the result with reference to the Erie Canal as follows: The rates per ton per mile on the railroads and the canal show a great reduction from 1857 to 1880. In 1857 the rates per ton per mile were—

	1857.	1880.
New York Central Railroad	3.12	.88
Canals	.799	.49

The Erie Canal—

He says—

continues to exert an exceedingly important influence as a regulator of rail rates, and although with respect to through traffic the Erie Canal successfully competes with the New York Central Railroad chiefly for the transportation of grain, minerals, lumber, and other coarse freights; yet if the rail rates on the higher classes of freights are much advanced, a large deflection of traffic at once takes place to the slower and cheaper mode of transportation by the canal. Rail rates are adjusted with reference to this fact.

Henry G. Herte, esq., secretary of the National Cotton Exchange, gives a statement of the effect of the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi on the commerce of that river and the region lying west of it, in which statistics rise to eloquence.

Mr. Windom gives the following result of the investigations of his committee (report, pages 52 and 53):

During the year 1872 the "all-rail" rates were 24.5 per cent. higher than the "all-water" rates, the "lake and rail" rates were 7 per cent. higher than the "all-water" rates, and the "all-rail" rates were 16.3 per cent. higher than the "lake and rail" rates.

The average summer rail rate for 1872 (May, June, July, August, September, October, and November) was 31⅞ cents, and the average winter rail rates in 1872 (December, January, February, March, and April) was 36¾ cents, the average winter rate being 16 per cent. higher than the average summer rate. By comparing the all-rail rates for the months of June, July, and August with the all-rail rates for December, January, and February we obtain a more accurate expression of the effect of ample water facilities in competition with equally ample rail facilities. The average all-rail rate during the three summer months just named was 27 cents, and the average of the winter months was 39, the winter average being 44.4 per cent. higher than the summer average, when the competition of water transport was in full force. It may be supposed that the increase in the rail rates during the winter months is caused by the increased cost of transport during that season of the year, but this is true only to a very limited extent. The chief cause is the absence of competition by lake and canal. This is evident from the fact that although the cost of transportation by rail is not greater in October and November than in June and July, yet the average of the rates during the former months is 44.4 per cent. higher than the average of the rates during the latter months.

The pressure of traffic during the months of October and November, when the facilities for transport by water are limited, in connection with the fact that the Erie Canal is at that time taxed to its utmost capacity, causes an advance in the rates on the lake and on the canal, and the rail rates at once go up to about the average for the winter months. It appears that in this case the increased charges by rail are due solely to the increase in the rates on the lake and on the canal. This fact was clearly stated before the committee by Mr. J. M. Walker, president of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway (evidence, page 266), a road which does not compete with any water line. Mr. Walker states that the winter and summer rates are the same on his road, and he thinks that "this is the rule with the Western roads generally." He states, also, that he believes that those roads which run in competition with transport on the Mississippi River makes such changes in their freight tariffs.

It is generally true that the roads which increase their rates during the winter months are those which run in competition with the water lines during the summer months, and it is quite probable, therefore, that but for such water competition the winter rates would be maintained throughout the year.

Mr. Franklin Edson, the president of the New York Produce Exchange, declares in a letter to Mr. Windom:

The water lines may be so improved that during seven and one-half months of the year the time of transit from Chicago and Milwaukee to New York need not be more than ten to eleven days, at a cost of about $3 to $3.50 per ton, including all charges, and quantity always guaranteed. The said charge in summer from Chicago to New York can not be less than $8 per ton to pay actual expenses and no dividends, and in order to pay dividends there has to be an advance of about $4 per ton in the railway freight charges, which advance is uniformly made every year on the close of the water lines by frost. (Windom, App., 176.)

A striking exhibition of the effect of water competition in reducing rail freight charges is given to the Senate committee by Mr. Utley, president of the Illinois and Michigan Canal:

The freight charges on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad is only 8 cents per hundred pounds from Henry to Chicago, between which points there is water competition, while the route from Tiskilwa, only twelve miles farther west than Henry and beyond the effect of canal competition, is 15 cents per hundred pounds, or nearly as much for twelve miles as for one hundred miles.

This is but one of hundreds, probably thousands, of instances no less remarkable. The cost of the freight of a bale of cotton from New York to Cold Brook, in the county where I dwell, one hundred and eighty-four miles, was, at a recent date, .28 per hundred pounds. The charge for the same bale of cotton transported by all rail from Savannah to New York, a thousand miles, was at the same period a trifle less.

This is because of the competing water line. Every dollar expended in the improvement of the harbor at Savannah cheapens the cotton to the manufacturer in the interior of Massachusetts.

I annex some tables (pages 5852, 5853) showing the constant reduction of freights and the comparative cost of freights by water and by rail.

Thus the competition by water operates in reduction of railroad tariffs, and no understanding among railroad managers can prevent it.

Foreign commerce is represented by an export in the twelve months ending April 30, 1884, of $860,194,901, and an import of $761,405,450. Vast as these sums appear, our exports of food and cotton are yet small compared with the productive capacity of our domain. The center of production of each is still rapidly traveling westward. We hope in a not distant future to rival them with our export of manufactures. How narrow and timid the parsimony which grudges the outlay of a few millions when imperatively demanded by this immense interest! Every dollar expended in removing the obstructions in the pathway of this commerce to the sea has borne fruit and will hereafter bear fruit a hundred-fold in national wealth and power. All expenditures we have ever made or ever proposed on lakes, rivers, and harbors together are trifling compared with what our rivals are putting forth to maintain themselves against our competition. We have 23,000 miles of stormy and dangerous coast line on the oceans alone. England has but 1,300; yet she expended fifteen millions on her harbors in 1874.

The breakwater at Plymouth cost her $7,214,325. That at Portland cost her $5,043,870. Holyhead cost her $6,499,895. The total expenditure of the Clyde Trust to June 30, 1875, was £6,774,315 or, about $33,000,000, a sum greater than we had expended on all our rivers and harbors together from the foundation of the Government to 1873, and three times as much as we had expended on our 20,000 miles of Western rivers. This outlay has converted the Clyde from a shallow stream, fordable at many points between Glasgow and the sea, into a river capable of bearing on its waters the commerce and ships of all nations. Yet we are accused of extravagance when we would devote a fifth part of this sum to the thousand miles of the Mississippi. I can not give the expenditure upon the Mersey. But the debt of the Mersey Docks and Harbor Board outstanding in 1882 was $81,424,405.

It is difficult to find a full and satisfactory statement of the expenditure of Great Britain for this class of works, as they are largely committed to special boards, whose returns are not accessible; but some facts we know. To stimulate the cotton culture of India as a rival to ours she guaranteed the interest on an outlay for Indian improvements of $400,000,000. She is now contemplating a much larger outlay for India. She pays annual interest on the Suez exchequer bonds of £199,874, and now proposes a second canal across that isthmus.

Canada enlists in the competition with an expenditure on her government railroads since 1868 of $30,406,481. She subsidizes a line of steamships to Brazil. In 1880–'81 she paid on capital account $8,176,316, of which $4,968,503 represents outlay on the Pacific Railroad, $608,702 on the Intercolonial Railway, $1,242,903 on the Welland Canal, $411,608 on the Ottawa canals, $334,681 on Dominion lands, and the remainder on the other canals. In the same year she spent $2,900,000 on public works. In the year after the union of her two provinces, Canada, with a population of little more than a million and a total revenue of $1,488,000, expended two millions for her canals.

England is not for herself or her colonies contented to foster her commerce by this class of expenditures alone. Her navy charge, which for 1882 was $53,782,265, the cost of her army, which for the same year was $92,222,925, the subsidies she grants her lines of steamships, her costly diplomatic service, are but the seed which this great husbandman sows broadcast, whose return is reaped in the abundant harvest of the commerce of barbarous and semi-barbarous states.

The statistics of France which pertain to this subject are more exact. General Wright, the Chief of Engineers, has caused a table to be prepared showing her expenditures from 1878 to 1882.

I take the following from the Edinburgh Review for October, 1882:

In brief, the actual water ways of France amount to an aggregate length of 7,069 miles, not including any maritime navigation, such as that of the Seine below Rouen. The cost of this fine system has been £43,608,516, or £6,239 per mile. One thousand eight hundred and thirteen additional miles have been authorized and are in course of execution by the state, the cost of which, together with that of the improvements required on the existing lines, will at least be an equal sum. France will shortly be possessed of 8,880 miles of inland water way, provided at a cost of from £80,000,000 to £100,000,000.

On the 7,069 miles of French canals, according to the report of M. Krantz, the transports amounted in 1874 to 2,132,957,000 units of traffic, or kilometric tons. This is equal to 126,000 tons per mile. In 1868, according to the Etude historique et statique sur les Voies de communication de la France, par M. Felix Lucas, published in 1873, the navigation dues produced 3,503,000 francs for 1,690,000,000 kilometric tons. This charge, which may be taken to cover cost of maintenance and interest of money on the canals, is equivalent to 0.0325*d.* per ton per mile. In 1847, under the régime of the old tariff, the dues amounted to 9,931,000 francs for 1,198,000,000 tons kilometric.

Since 1847, therefore, by comparing the two reports, it would seem that the French canal dues have been reduced by three-fourths, and that the canal traffic has nearly doubled. The chief disadvantage of the minute statistics of which the French are justly proud is the long time that generally elapses before their outcome is thoroughly known. The date to which the figures of M. Krantz apply is not stated in his report. But there can be no doubt that the actual movement on the French canals is very much greater than the average above cited. * * *

Without wearying our readers with any further arithmetical detail, we may say that the closest calculation of the cost price of conveyance on the railways of the United Kingdom which has been found hitherto practicable gives for the year 1878 the cost of a little more than one-fifth of a penny (.2076*d.*) per mile for every ton of loaded train. This price compares favorably with the corresponding item, where it has elsewhere been definitively ascertained. It is almost exactly that of the working of the ancien réseau of the Orleans Railway in 1872, and, as a rule, is intermediate between the cost of continental lines and those of the East Indian and Pennsylvania railways.

At this price, supposing all the wagons to be full and the traffic to be conducted on the most favorable conditions, the cost of conveying a ton of coal amounts to an average of 0.472*d.* per mile, allowing for the return of the empty wagons. This, however, is for the tabulated working expenses alone. If we take them as equal to 52 per cent. of revenue, as was the case in 1879, it will require the price of 0.908*d.* per ton per mile to pay 4½ per cent. interest on capital. In other words, the work which is done for a third of a penny by canal will cost nine-tenths of a penny on a railway; the former price covering 5 per cent. interest on capital, and sinking fund, the latter covering only 4½ per cent. interest and no sinking fund.

These statistics become doubly impressive when we reflect that we have a single American State, one only among our thirty-eight States and eight Territories, which is as large as France in territory, and far greater in its rich and various productive capacity.

Mr. GROOME. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Massachusetts I will move an adjournment, as he has been a long time on the floor.

Mr. HOAR. It is very hot, and if it makes no delay to the business of the Senate I shall conclude what I have to say to-morrow.

Mr. GROOME. I will change the motion and move an executive session.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask what the condition of the bill is in reference to its passage?

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are some few amendments to be offered.

Mr. PLUMB. If this bill is not to pass to-night I shall feel constrained to-morrow to antagonize it with another bill. I am satisfied besides that if that antagonism should not be made it will be antagonized by the sundry civil appropriation bill. If the Senate is to adjourn this week, as there has been some hint it might, it would become Senators now to forego questions of personal convenience and comfort, and address themselves to the question of closing up the legislation necessary to be done in order that the session may be brought to an end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the motion the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator in charge of the bill will find it altogether better for the bill to pass it to-night if it is to be passed at all.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas that so far as the sundry civil appropriation is concerned it has no precedence over the bill appropriating money for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope we shall not get into a controversy between these two bills. The sundry civil bill will take precedence to-morrow.

Mr. McMILLAN. The controversy was inaugurated by the Senator from Kansas, and I only wish to say that there shall be no antagonism between them.

Mr. PLUMB. It has not been the fault of the Senator from Kansas at all that this bill has been so dilatorily handled.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will attend to——

Mr. PLUMB. The responsibility for carrying the session beyond this week will be on those in charge of this bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Kansas will attend to managing the bills of which he has charge, that will be sufficient for him to do.

Mr. PLUMB. I will give some attention to the river and harbor bill, too.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator is at liberty to do that at any time he wants to when he can get the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator had better not have the Senate adjourn now if he wants the bill passed.

Mr. McMILLAN. At the present time the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has the floor, I believe.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that motion is put I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HOAR. I have no desire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] for an executive session?

Mr. HOAR. I have no desire myself to have the Senate adjourn. It is quite agreeable to me to finish what I have to say to-night as far as that is concerned.

Mr. GROOME. Then with the permission of the Senator I withdraw the motion I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations ask permission to make a report.

Mr. BLAIR. The motion last made was a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion was modified to a motion for an executive session and then withdrawn.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to go on to-night, of course I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. If my colleague is not fatigued, I hope he will feel like going on.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House receded from its disagreement to the tenth, eleventh, and seventeenth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and agreed to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message from the House of Representatives will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 1, 1883.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the tenth, eleventh, and seventeenth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and agree to the same.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to report at this time from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with amendments. I give notice that I will call the bill up at the earliest practicable moment consistent with other matters pending before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1111) granting an increase of pension to Sally Rodman, widow of General Isaac P. Rodman; and

A bill (S. 1112) granting a pension to John Sweeney.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5636) for the relief of Otto Leissring, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2105) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Passed Assistant Engineer Nathan B. Clark a chief engineer on the retired-list, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House requested the Senate to return to that body the bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREY AND OTHERS.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the order be made according to the request of the House of Representatives for the return of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 1, 1884.

Ordered, That the Clerk request the Senate to return to the House the bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the order will be made for the return of the bill. The Chair hears none.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. HORR. The Constitution commits to Congress the care of commerce with foreign nations and among the States. The title of these two objects to the national care is equal, if we look only to the words ofthe constitutional mandate. But important as is foreign commerce in its relation either to national wealth or national dignity, domestic commerce is infinitely more important. I wish to repeation this connection a few sentences from what I have said elsewhere.

We have a dominion, excluding Alaska, greater than the Roman Empire at its largest. It is only a sixth less in extent than all Europe with her sixty empires, kingdoms, and republics. But by our marvelous lake and river system this extent of country is severed for all purposes of internal and external commerce into twenty islands of the size of Great Britain. It is 2,750 miles from Boston to Queenstown. This pathway is over a barren and desolate sea, beset with mist and iceberg, bearing no living thing upon its bosom except the vessels which brave its dangers. At the end of the voyage is a foreign, rival nation to share, and perhaps to monopolize, the profit of the adventure. Not so with the pathways of domestic commerce. It is a thousand miles by river from Pittsburg to Cairo. It is a thousand miles from Cairo to the mouth of the Mississippi. There are 2,500 navigable miles from Saint Louis to the headwaters of the Missouri. And yet these are but a small fraction of the internal water courses of America adapted or easily to be adapted to the purposes of national commerce. Europe possesses no such dominion. She has no considerable towns, except those in her eastern plain, more than four hundred miles distant from the sea. Her Danube, her Rhine, her Rhone, her Thames are petty streamlets compared with those which, with their approaches and affluents, demand the care of American statesmanship.

Our domestic commerce does not travel the pathless and desolate wastes of the sea. Its river pathways are bounded by farms and factories and homes and populous towns. The river is the creator of the city. Domestic commerce is all American. England spends fifty millions a year on her navy, in time of peace, that she may command the markets of semi-barbarous nations. Our domestic commerce does not find India or Egypt or Turkey at the end of its journey. It finds there Iowa and Wisconsin and Missouri and California and Oregon. It is perpetually creating new and free States, like those which are coming into life between the Mississippi and the Pacific; like that bearing the name of Washington, which our own sons are building on Puget Sound, to be in the near future another and a larger Massachusetts. Domestic commerce divides its profits with no foreigner. It is American at both ends.

The statistics of this American commerce are as yet but imperfectly gathered. But we know enough to conceive dimly its immense and rapidly growing proportions. The whole exports of this country for the year ending April 3, 1884, were: Domestic products, $784,302,373; foreign products, $32,200,157; in all, $816,502,530.

The total value of American manufactures by the census of 1880 was $5,369,579,191, of which only about one hundred millions, or 2 per cent., was exported. Ninety-eight per cent., therefore, becomes the subject of internal commerce.

It would be easy to demonstrate that our domestic commerce exceeds our foreign in its real value to the nation more than a hundred-fold. We are groping still blindly after new policies which shall increase our exports and bring back to us our foreign carrying trade. But every ten years of our life adds 30 per cent. to our population, brings to us a new nation of 15,000,000 of persons to be our customers and producers at home. What foreign commerce is like that? The commerce of the cities of the Ohio River is undoubtedly more than two thousand millions a year. We annually pay for transportation more than double the entire revenues of the Government. Our seven Ohio States have 100,000 square miles of bituminous coal field, more than six times that of Great Britain, France, and Belgium combined. The production of their workshops exceeds by more than 50 per cent. the whole imports and exports of Great Britain to and from all countries. Even in the cities where our foreign commerce is greatest it is insignificant in comparison with their domestic commerce and their manufacture. The trade of New York city in the products of the labor of New England alone is greater than the whole foreign commerce carried on at that city, while the product of her manufactures was in 1880 $814,000,000.

I must not abuse the patience of the Senate by relating the wonderful and fascinating story of the growth of our commerce as shown in certain localities, such as Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, the upper Missouri, and our great empire on the Pacific. The Senator from Oregon told us something the other day of the marvelous developments and still more marvelous promise of his own State.

It is estimated that Washington Territory will send abroad this year 350,000,000 feet of lumber, 200,000 tons of coal, 200,000 pounds of hops, 200,000 cases of salmon, 5,000,000 bushels of wheat, 3,000,000 bushels of oats, 1,000,000 bushels of potatoes, and 2,500,000 pounds of wool. In cargoes of 1,500 tons this produce will load nine hundred large ships.

Mr. Poor, in his railroad manual, estimates the value of the tonnage moved in this country by rail alone in 1881, deducting one-third for duplication, at $12,000,000,000. Taking the movements of merchandise by water ways and land ways other than by rail into account, the domestic produce moved and exchanged in this country must be at least between thirty and forty thousand millions of dollars in value, or more than forty times the value of our exports. The river commerce of the single city of Cincinnati was last year more than $45,000,000. There passes each year up and down Detroit River a tonnage greater than enters Liverpool. The number of vessels that go in and out of Chicago annually exceeds by 7,000 those of New York; and although these vessels are, of course, smaller in size, the actual tonnage of Chicago is much more than half that of New York. These water ways are not only of vast importance in themselves, but they are important also as a check upon the prices charged by the railroad. They are free. When the water way is once fitted for transport it is the property of all mankind.

The legislators of the States and of the nation have exhausted their ingenuity to impose shackles upon the railroad. Sometimes the attempt has been to fix rates by law; sometimes a rate according to distance; sometimes relief is sought by endowing competing routes; and in one memorable instance the State has been urged to take the business of railroad management into its own hands. But the strength of these giants frequently, I am bound to say, with reason, and with the laws of trade on their side, bursts in sunder these puny legislative fetters. Railroad competition terminates in railroad combination. The only check on the power of the great railroad lines, when in concert, over the commerce of the nation is the competition of the water way. When the Erie Canal and the harbors of the lakes freeze in the winter up go the freights. When canal, lake, and river open in the spring down go the freights.

I do not and can not overstate the importance of this consideration to the American people, and more especially to Massachusetts. The diminution of the price of freight on the railroads of this country one mill a ton a mile makes an annual saving to the people of $70,000,000. Great as is the interest of the South and West in domestic commerce and transportation, it is not so great as that of Massachusetts. She manufactures nearly one thousand million in value every year. Of this I am justified, by the opinion of a business man of large experience, in saying not one-fiftieth is sent beyond sea. The rest goes all over the land, by river and rail and lake, to be distributed in the West and South, whence come her food and her iron and coal, and wool and hides and cotton.

Every obstruction removed from the channel in a Western river, every sunken rock blown out from a lake harbor, every creek or inlet by which a navigable stream reaches its arms into the midst of wheat fields or cotton plantations, is an obstacle the less in the way of the food to the mouths of her workmen, in the way of the material which their cunning fingers are to change into products of use and beauty, in the way of the sale of her manufactures to the customers on whom her wealth is to depend.

To four principal objects must the statesmanship of Massachusetts look in the future. Four things are needed for her prosperity.

First. Education and skill in her people.

Second. The maintenance and increase of her rate of wages.

Third. The annihilation of time and distance in the conveyance of her material and her products.

Fourth. A rich and prosperous South and West with whom to deal.

Mr. Windom estimates and demonstrates that the annual saving to New England on the transportation of grain alone by the completion of a single water line costing about eleven million of dollars, would have amounted in 1872 to $6,169,834, and a saving of $6.70 per ton on all the tonnage between the Mississippi and the East. So that this single improvement would have paid for itself in a single year in its saving in the cost of food and material to New England alone.

The average haul on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company for the year ending September 30, 1881, was 228.34 miles. If we call the average for the United States of the tonnage hauled two hundred miles, a saving of one mill per ton per mile is an annual saving of $70,000,000, if Mr. Poor's estimate of the whole tonnage for that year, 350,000,000 tons, be taken as correct.

Of the saving to New England in the diminution of freights of course the larger share inures to Massachusetts. Her share in foreign commerce can be retained and extended only as she can diminish the burden of transportation between the interior and the seaboard. To cheapen her supply of food she must place the granaries of the West at the door of her workshops. Every diminution in the cost of bringing material and coal to her workshops and carrying her product to market aids her skilled labor in its competition with foreign rivals and the new manufactories of the South and West.

Massachusetts is the third manufacturing State in the Union, and Boston is the sixth manufacturing city. In 1880 Massachusetts converted a material of three hundred and eighty-six millions into a product of six hundred and thirty-one millions, not including the manufacture of gas or of the products of fisheries or that done by railroads. In this she employed a capital of more than three hundred millions, and paid in wages $128,315,362. She employed 352,255 persons, who undoubtedly support by their labor 1,500,000 persons. Boston alone converts in her workshops a material of eighty-one millions six hundred thousand into a product of one hundred and thirty millions five hundred thousand, employing a capital of near fifty millions, and giving occupation to more than 60,000 persons, and support to more than 300,000 persons. I suppose Massachusetts does not sell one-fiftieth of this product beyond sea, and does not produce one-fiftieth of this material within her own borders. She is the farthest from her supplies and her market of all the States of the Union, save two. The freight both ways handicaps her just so much in her competition with her vigorous Western rivals. I hope and believe that she would support this policy of internal improvements on national grounds alone. But she certainly can claim no credit for disinterestedness.

The cost of transportation is sheer burden or tax, benefiting nobody. The bushel of wheat has the same instrinsic value in Minnesota as in London. The yard of cloth has the same intrinsic value in Lowell and in Galveston. To annihilate distance, to put every portion of the country on an equality with every other so far as relates to its market of purchase and its market of sale should be the object of our statesmanship.

There is another object not sufficiently considered which can only be accomplished by that national care which it imperatively demands. That is the annexing to the general system localities of large productive capacity whose development is prevented and who are now unable to take their fair share in its commercial advantages by physical obstacles which a moderate and economic expenditure would overcome. There are many towns along our seacoast or the shores of our lakes or near the mouths of rivers or creeks where a large manufacturing business is springing up, which are wholly dependent on railroads for all their freights or which are without railroads, where ample water communication might be secured at slight cost. There are many Western communities whose wheat or bacon or beef can be taken to a foreign market at a profit by the removal, for a few thousand dollars, of a sand bank or rock in some river. There are many rich Southern cotton districts into which commerce can thrust its arms by clearing from mud some creek which runs up from the neighboring harbor. These are not situated directly upon the great routes across the continent, but their trade is with foreign nations or with other States. Each of them is placed by the Constitution under the care of Congress. In the aggregate they contribute an enormous share to the production of the country, and to their development we must look chiefly for its increase. Such cases are Cambridge, Lynn, and Taunton, in my own State. Each of those has been made the subject of criticism. There has been about $60,000 made available for the improvement of Charles River above the bridges, of which only about ten thousand has been expended. When this improvement is completed a population in Cambridge, Brookline, Belmont, Watertown, Newton, Brighton, and the Back Bay district will make a saving of from 15 to 20 cents a ton upon heavy and bulky articles imported from other States, such as coal, lumber, iron, lime, wood, stone, and sand. This would make a saving to that community of the cost of the entire improvement in a single year. Now, there are but two or three hours a day in which vessels of any size can be safely moved. The result of the proposed work would be to enable vessels drawing seventeen feet to be safely moved to their destination in a single tide. Now vessels of ten or twelve feet often require two or three tides. Along the bank of this river, as I am told, at a depth of two to six feet, is subsoil of coarse, hard gravel, where the heaviest warehouses or factories can be sustained without piles, so that several miles of water front, with wharves, warehouses, and factories can here be added to the water front of Boston Harbor. Here then is an expenditure which is each year to save its whole cost in lifting a burden from a population double that of the whole city of Boston within my own lifetime and many times double measuring it by its products and its commercial wants. Lynn is a city of 40,000, and yet only seventh in size of the twenty-two fair cities which Massachusetts wears as the gems on her coronet. She has six hundred manufacturing establishments. She employs nearly 10,000 workmen. She gives activity to a capital of thirteen millions, and does a yearly business of thirty-five millions.

She asks that her harbor through which comes to her her coal, which is the motive power of her industries, her lumber, iron, stone, brick, lime, cement, and clay, may at a reasonable cost be fitted for the larger vessels which modern commerce finds most economical, and that she shall not be at the mercy of railroads or compelled to land her supplies ten miles off in Boston. Are not these things to be done? The commerce of Lynn and Cambridge is with foreign nations and with other States. It is borne upon navigable waters solely within the national jurisdiction. These communities could not do if they would, and you would not permit them if they would, to do what Great Britain does in like cases—empower a local board to do the work and defray the cost by tolls upon commerce. If these objects are not national, the post-office and the light-house and the courts of the United States are not national.

This can be and should be done by the General Government, and not by States or private persons. The Constitution not only imposes this duty on the National Government, but that it might be discharged was the principal reason for which the National Government was established. Individuals and States have no jurisdiction over interstate or international commerce, can not impose tolls, and have no power to create even temporary obstacles in navigable waters for the purpose of their improvement. All the high exercises of power which regulate these two great classes of commercial transactions belong to Congress alone. The General Government takes all the receipts and revenues of commerce. For the general good it prohibits all export duties and forbids the States from laying duties on tonnage without the consent of Congress. It takes all the receipts of commerce; therefore where expenditures are needed for it they should be made by the General Government. The limitations within which this power should be exercised seem to me not difficult to state.

First. The public advantages must be clearly worth the expenditure. The popular jealousy of all large outlays of public money is natural and reasonable, and should be respected. No item should get a place among appropriations of this class which can not stand by itself and vindicate its claim beyond all reasonable doubt by its sure promise of a return many times exceeding the original cost.

Second. The commerce to be promoted must be a commerce with foreign nations or between different States.

Third. The sum appropriated in any one year must fall within the limits prescribed by a wise economy, having regard to the condition of the Treasury and to other public needs.

The earnest public discussion which followed the passage of the river and harbor bill in the summer of 1882 calls upon Congress for a careful re-examination of the policy upon which these appropriations rest, and of every item in detail. Nothing is healthier than public jealousy as to the spending of public money. But it is remarkable when we get out of the region of mere clamor to find how little anybody, speaking under a sense of responsibility, has been able to bring against that much-abused measure.

April 17, 1882, the President sent a special message to Congress urging an appropriation of $1,100,000 to close gaps in the Mississippi levees, as recommended by the Mississippi River Commission, in addition to a like sum for which an estimate had already been submitted. The President expresses his own approval of the plans of the commission. He adds:

> The immense losses and widespread suffering of the people dwelling near the river induce me to urge upon Congress the propriety of not only making an appropriation to close the gaps in the levees occasioned by the recent floods, as recommended by the commission, but that Congress should inaugurate measures for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the river and security of the valley. It may be that such a system of improvement would as it progressed require the appropriation of twenty or thirty millions of dollars; even such an expenditure, extending as it must over several years, can not be regarded as extravagant in view of the immense interest involved. The safe and convenient navigation of the Mississippi is a matter of concern to all sections of the country; but to the Northwest, with its immense harvests needing cheap transportation to the sea, and to the inhabitants of the river valley whose lives and property depend upon the proper construction of the safeguards which protect them from the floods, it is of vital importance that a well-matured and comprehensive plan for improvement should be put into operation with as little delay as possible. The cotton product of the region subject to the devastating floods is a source of wealth to the nation and of great importance in keeping the balance of trade in our favor.
> It may not be inopportune to mention that this Government has imposed and collected some $70,000,000 by a tax on cotton, in the production of which the population of the lower Mississippi is largely engaged, and it does not seem inequitable to return a portion of this tax to those who contributed it, particularly as such an action will also result in an important gain to the country at large, and especially so to the great and rich States of the Northwest and the Mississippi Valley.

Congress differed with the Executive. A majority doubted the constitutional power to appropriate money to save lands in the States bordering on the lower Mississippi from overflow by that river. They found it difficult to point out a reason for undertaking to relieve at the national charge the land overflowed by the Mississippi, which would not require the performance of a like duty between high and low water mark along the entire Atlantic and Pacific coasts and on every stream within our borders. They therefore carefully eliminated from the bill all appropriations for levees and inserted an express provision that "no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming land or preventing injury to lands by overflow." I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt that the levee system alone, not including any work designed for improvement in navigation, surely would have cost thirty million—the larger limit named by the President. Some cautious judges estimate it at fifty million.

Congress reduced by a million the sum recommended by the commission for the river below Cairo. But they introduced $1,100,000 for the upper Mississippi. The policy adopted by Congress saved to the country more than twenty-nine millions, not improbably more than fifty million as compared with that of the President.

The President, however, was of the opinion that the bill contained items which were not of national importance. He sent to Congress a veto message in which he specified no objectionable instance and reaffirmed his approval of the Mississippi appropriation. But he declared that some of the objects provided for were local only, and suggested without directly asserting that some claims were inserted in the bill to win favor for others. But he gave Congress none of the information on which he had relied. At the next session the House of Representatives directed the Secretary of War, from whose Department the President was naturally supposed to have derived the knowledge upon which he acted, to inform them "whether any moneys appropriated by the act of August 2, 1882, making appropriations, &c., were appropriated for works or objects that are not in the interest of or do not benefit commerce or navigation; and, if so, to name such works or objects and the respective amounts so appropriated."

The Secretary replies that he understands the direction of the House as if the words "foreign or interstate" preceded the word "commerce," and that he is "relieved by the President from hesitation as to the scope of the response," and that he has made a new and very extended examination of the subjects covered.

This answer, made many months after the passage of the bill, doubtless was based on all the information in the possession of the President as well as upon the new and very extended examination he had himself made. He specifies $1,032,000, about 5 per cent. of the whole bill, as not in the interest of commerce and navigation. Considering the likelihood of difference of opinion upon a subject of this kind this is a very strong and interesting concession, not only to the merits of the general policy but of the particular measure. There are very few appropriation bills, or bills made up of items, in which the majority who pass them, the committee who frame them, and even the member who reports them, would not find a larger percentage of objection. The difference between the President and Congress was this: he would add twenty or thirty millions for Mississippi levees and strike off a million which he thinks for local objects only; Congress would keep off the twenty or thirty millions, but would retain the one million to be expended, however, only if the President's objections are removed.

Not only are the objections of the Executive, so far as we can learn, limited to about 5 per cent. only of the entire appropriation, but a large portion of the items which make that up are such as I think would meet the public approbation. I believe the President would himself change his mind on fuller information. I will not go over them all, but I will take those in my own State. Three, and three only, are specified within the limits of Massachusetts as not being for the interest or benefit of foreign or interstate commerce and navigation. These are: Plymouth Harbor, $14,000; Wareham River, $5,000; and Wood's Holl, $50,000. The appropriation of 1882 for Plymouth Harbor was made as the result of a special and urgent communication of the Secretary of War, dated April 7, 1882, inclosing a special report of the engineer. This was not inserted by any representative of Massachusetts in either House, and first became known to me and my colleague when our attention was called to it by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. This famous historic harbor depends for its existence on the protection and preservation of Long Beach, a spit of sand projecting two and three-quarters miles out to sea. The Secretary informed us that the equinoctial storm of 1882 had made a break over this, and that another of equal severity would very probably destroy the harbor by filling the channel with the sands of the beach. It was recommended that the sum of $14,000, which it would cost to complete the breakwater nearly finished, be made available at once, instead of being extended over two years, as had been designed. This breakwater is so extended as to be an ample shelter for the beach and save the entire harbor.

The commercial reasons which render Plymouth a proper object of national care are well stated in the engineer's report for 1870, page 458.

The State of Massachusetts contributed $2,000 to this purpose in 1867.

Now, sir, this case of Plymouth presents and illustrates the precise issue which I make with the opponents of this policy. It has a commerce with foreign nations and among the States. The public good far exceeds the outlay. It is placed by the Constitution under the care of Congress. No other authority is competent to do the work, and no other authority should do the work, if it were competent. It is not for the public advantage that the commerce of New York and Boston should be the sole objects of care, and that of Plymouth and Wareham should die out. The large appropriations to remove the rocks of Hell Gate from the approach to New York harbor or to construct the jetties which have opened the mouth of the Mississippi do not bring us a more valuable return than the aggregate of small appropriations on which the commercial prosperity of hundreds of Plymouths and Warehams depend. The life of the centers is to be perserved, but the extremities should not die.

Wareham is an equally strong case. The reports of the engineers (1874, page 218; 1879, page 303) give some of the reasons which justify the small outlay provided for in the statute of 1882. These reasons have strengthened with the increase of business since 1879:

There is a smaller commerce in brick, lime, hay, clay, shells, wood, boats, cement, and similar coastwise traffic.

Wareham is the nearest port to Sandwich and to the inland towns of Middleborough, Bridgewater, and Brockton, the commerce and manufactures of each of which equal those of Wareham. The railroad wharves of Wareham have direct railway connection with these and other tributary towns, but inadequate navigation facilities in Wareham Harbor oblige these towns to receive their water-borne supplies via Fairhaven and Somerset.

The total tonnage of vessels hailing from Wareham is 6,002 tons, so far as known. The commerce of the port is not, however, carried in these, but more generally is transported by water in other vessels of the United States.

The yearly arrivals and departures at this port comprise, together, about three hundred and fifty sailing vessels and also occasional steamers, and numerous small craft. The supplies for the iron mills are brought in schooners of 350 to 600 tons burden, manufacturers considering it profitable to employ larger vessels than formerly in freighting cargoes of coal and iron. The wharves in Wareham Harbor are rendered difficult of approach for such vessels by reason of bars in the tortuous channel. The nature of the above-mentioned industries of this town is such that its railway traffic is dependent upon the facilities for navigation.

It is hard to see by what process of reasoning the propriety of the appropriation for Wood's Holl can be seriously called in question. The small expenditure would be abundantly warranted by the demand for a harbor of refuge and a port for the revenue cutters which are constantly needed for aid to the vessels which pass in our harbors over the foggy and dangerous navigation of the neighboring Nantucket Shoals. But it is demanded also to construct a basin and harbor for the United States Fish Commission, whose interesting work seems destined to create an abundant food supply for uncounted millions in the near future.

Mr. President, there are few objects of expenditure which do not perish with the using. There are fewer still which survive the generation which has created them. A few works of art; a few temples and public buildings; a few dwellings, kept for curiosity rather than occupation; a few great libraries are all of the possessions of our day which will survive a hundred years. The money you have appropriated for the Army, the Navy, the Post-Office, the courts, for the cost of legislation, for the diplomatic service, for pensions, will leave no trace behind when the year in which it has been expended shall have passed. But the works which this bill authorizes will remain, making their annual and perpetual returns, instruments of commerce, of union, and of peace, so long as the rivers run to the sea and the sea beats upon the shore.

NOTE.—The tables from which the above table is made up will be found on pages 162, 300, 171, and 604 of Poor's Manual.

[From New York Produce Exchange annual report for 1882, page 508.]

Average lake rates between Chicago and Buffalo:
1868 to 1872, both inclusive, 7.78 cents per bushel.
1873 to 1877, both inclusive, 4.34 cents per bushel.
1878 to 1882, both inclusive, 3.90 cents per bushel.

[From report on commerce and navigation, 1883, Treasury Department, page lxvii.]

Average lake and canal rates, including Buffalo transfer charges and tolls:
1868 to 1872, both inclusive, 23 cents per bushel for wheat.
1873 to 1877, both inclusive, 12.4 cents per bushel for wheat.
1878 to 1883, both inclusive, 10.7 cents per bushel for wheat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I wish to submit in connection with this bill a statement of the aggregates.

The aggregate of the House bill as it came to the Senate was $12,086,200. The increase which the Senate Committee on Commerce added was $1,268,000. The aggregate of the bill as reported by the Senate committee was $13,354,200. The aggregate of the bill as it is about to be passed by the Senate as it now stands, unless some inaccuracy has been made in stating the amendments, is $13,584,700.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OLIN WELLBORN of Texas, Mr. RICE A. PIERCE of Tennessee, and Mr. BISHOP W. PERKINS of Kansas managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ANTWERP INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It is desirable to have an order at this time. I ask unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate discharging the Committee on Foreign Relations from the consideration of certain papers in relation to the participation of the United States at the international exhibition to be held at Antwerp in 1885 be reconsidered, and that the papers may be referred back to the committee for further action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the motion suggested by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

ENROLLED BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman; and

A bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the presentation of petitions and reports, I shall ask to take up the sundry civil bill, and I wish to say to Senators that if we are to adjourn, as we hope to do, within the time generally understood to be implied by the bill passed yesterday it will be necessary for that bill to be completed to-morrow. The bill will be distributed early in the morning to Senators so that they can have an opportunity of examining it.

I will say that after that bill passes there will be but one more appropriation bill to pass, the fortification bill, which will take but a few moments, so that Senators who have intervening business I trust will wait until this bill has passed the Senate and in the course of its final passage through a committee of conference.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the motion the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 1, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will be in order and attention given to the report of the conference committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) "making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

WALDO HUTCHINS,
SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the statement accompanying the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1885 submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The committee of conference found itself confronted with a disagreement between the two Houses of Congress upon the amendments of the Senate to the House bill numbered 44 and 48. These amendments cover the following subjects: No. 44 is the amendment appropriating $2,500,000 for the construction of one cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch-vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily-armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, one light gunboat of seven hundred and fifty tons [and one gunboat not to exceed nine hundred tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy]; one cruising torpedo-boat, two harbor torpedo-boats, and one steel ram, under limitations and provisions making a part of said amendment.

Amendment 48 provides for continuing work upon the double-turreted monitors, $2,000,000, the same to be applied toward procuring the side and turret armor and armament and finishing the vessels; and the Secretary of the Navy, acting under the advice of the naval advisory board, in the same manner in all respects as in the construction of the steel cruisers, shall not, in procuring such armor and armament and finishing the monitors, exceed as the total cost of such completion the amounts estimated in the report of the board of October 25, 1883, and the report of the Secretary of December 1, 1883; and in all purchases of armor or contracts for construction there shall be free and open public competition.

There were other Senate amendments to the appropriation bill where no agreement was reached by the conferees, but it is thought if an agreement should be reached by the two Houses upon the two amendments before referred to, numbered 44 and 48, the remainder of the bill could probably be adjusted satisfactorily to the committee of conference.

WALDO HUTCHINS,
SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is proper for me to say in the discharge of the duties of the conference we proceeded to consider the bill from the beginning with varying results as to agreements and disagreements until we came to the amendments of the Senate numbered 44 and 48. Those amendments involve the insertion in this appropriation bill of a measure passed by the Senate authorizing the construction of certain vessels which have been enumerated in the report of the House conferees.

The other point of material disagreement related to further appropriations to complete what are known as the iron-clad monitors. I do not think I step beyond the range of propriety when I say that the Senate seemed to have a lurking hope, which either ought to be affirmed or destroyed by positive action on our part, that ultimately the House would recede from its disagreement to those amendments. Understanding my duty as I do, and I think I speak for my associates on this side of the House, I say deliberately nothing but instruction from the House will induce the House conferees to yield on these two points. [Applause.] And why? Because we have not that confidence in the manner of construction of these cruisers that warrants any further expenditure of public money to duplicate them. And that judgment is not made up from our own knowledge on the subject. The naval constructor affirms his judgment as to the construction of the vessels, and the highest scientific mind in the Navy of the United States, whose character in reference to engineering and the construction of machinery is known the world over—I allude to Mr. Isherwood—both declare that the engines of these vessels are not such as they should be. I ask the Clerk to read what the naval constructor has said in reference to the Boston and the Atlanta.

The Clerk read as follows:

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You refer now to the Boston and Atlanta?

Chief Constructor WILSON. Yes, sir; I would not for one moment be considered as indorsing either one of those ships.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. What do you think will be the trouble with them?

Chief Constructor WILSON. In the first place, those ships have not sail power enough to go anywhere. They can not work under sail. If they get on a lee-shore they would go ashore despite all they could do. In a heavy sea their speed will be knocked down by forcing their bow into the sea, and the sea will be likely to roll on board aft as they ascend into it. An ironclad might be designed in that way, but I do not believe in designing a light unarmored cruiser in any such manner.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You think they will be failures practically?

Chief Constructor WILSON. I think these vessels will practically be failures as sea-going vessels. In smooth water there is no question but they will have speed and that they will go along very nicely, but in a sea I believe they will be a failure.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask now that an extract be read from a published letter addressed by Mr. Isherwood to Mr. HALE, of the Senate conferees, in relation to the boilers of the Chicago, and the material of the hull.

The Clerk read as follows:

The boilers of the Chicago have no superiority of any kind over those in use in the best foreign war vessels, and in our own; and in the best and most recent transatlantic steamships, namely, the cylindrical boiler with internal cylindrical furnaces; but they are a cheaper boiler to build. The space occupied, and the weight, including the contained water, is the same in both. Both are equally accessible, but the Chicago's boilers need, for a high rate of combustion, the large exposed steam-drums referred to, and they may fail even with their use and with a moderate rate of combustion. The objection to them is not their brick furnaces, but their liability to excessive priming. There are no advantages derivable from such furnaces except cheapness of construction, and that is an advantage for the contractor only, and no disadvantages except the always possible dislodgment of the bricks by the violent rolling and pitching of the vessel, or by careless use of the firing-tools; but even such possibilities should be avoided unless a great gain is to be obtained by incurring them.

The experiment of adopting these boilers was most injudicious; it was pure error of judgment and hazarded the success of the vessel for nothing; no gain was possible, and much loss was probable. Most certainly they should not be repeated in any other vessel.

The hull of the Chicago is constructed of what is conventionally called steel, but which is really iron—ingot iron, in contradistinction to puddled iron. This so-called steel has none of the properties of that metal, and is merely a particular make of iron. The definition of steel is an alloy of iron with carbon or chromium, that will take a temper and cut iron. Now, the metal of which the Chicago is built will do neither, and the name of steel applied to it is both a misnomer and misleading, for the non-expert will naturally suppose the material of the vessel to really have the qualities of true steel.

Mr. CALKINS. Who is the author of that?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Isherwood, formerly Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy. I might rest the action which we recommend to adhere and not yield to the incorporation of these amounts in the appropriation bill upon the opinion of these two accepted authorities, one now in office and the other formerly at the head of the Engineer Corps of the United States Navy. But I am willing to go further and say if it were necessary that there are not thrown around these propositions those safeguards for the expenditure of the money which circumstances known to the country demand in reference to a Department which is now being investigated.

The next question is as to the monitors. That is a subject which was duly considered in the last Congress, and the Committee on Appropriations of that body did not recommend to the House of Representatives any further appropriation of money in that connection, nor did the House in the passage of the original bill incorporate a dollar for that purpose. The bill went to the Senate, and there the amount was incorporated, and in a sort of coercive way, if I may be allowed in a parliamentary sense to use such a term, the House was compelled to yield. I want to have read in that connection, that it may be still further impressed upon the minds of the House, the language uttered upon this floor by a gentleman here in debate, whose experience as a business man and as a manufacturer in all the forms of iron and steel which enter into the construction of such vessels is large, and whose capacity to judge of such subjects is unquestioned. I ask the Clerk to read from the RECORD what was said on the floor a few weeks ago upon this point. This is a part of the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

The Clerk read as follows:

There are other questions behind this on which I am in full accord with the Appropriations Committee. I believe the monitors are a total failure. I believe every dollar spent on them is wasted, and I shall never vote, as I never have voted, a single dollar in behalf of the monitors.

I also believe we ought not to build any new cruisers until we know whether those now under way are good for something or not. But we can not tell whether they are good or not until we put guns on them and float them and try what they can do in the open ocean.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, in view of all these matters, in view of the general consideration of the subject in all of its bearings, I do not altogether object to these appropriations on the score of economy. I place my objection upon a judgment which I would call into action were it with reference to a matter relating to my own private affairs. No man possessed of ordinary judgment who was interested in the construction of a number of vessels but would first have one constructed and tested in every particular, both as to its speed, its sea-faring qualities, and its strength, and also as to the question of boilers and machinery, before proceeding with others. When, therefore, we are invited by the Senate or by any portion of the gentlemen on the other side of the House to expend further amounts of money in these directions, I say that we and the people of the United States have a right first to know whether these vessels are to be failures or are to be successful in construction.

And following this I want to add in conclusion that I do not wish any man in this House to give a wavering vote upon this question. I want him, as he will have an opportunity when his name is called, to render as far as he is able his final and conclusive purpose in relation to the matters in controversy, because, as I said before, there is nothing that will induce the present conferees or a majority of them to yield these two points of disagreement, except a direct vote of this House, and when that vote is given I trust they will select some other conferee than myself. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has forty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, the question presented to the House in these two amendments of the Senate as they now stand is simply this: first, is it the judgment of this House that we should stop the construction of any new cruisers and delay the work for a year or more, or shall this House take another advance step in the direction of building a navy. That is the first proposition. The next is, shall this House, after having expended very large sums of money, many millions of dollars, in building the four monitors, stop the work upon them altogether, leave them where they are, and expend no more money upon them for another year? These, sir, are the two questions which are presented; for I take it that no gentleman upon the floor, even though it be the Gladstone of the House, my honored chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will say that the monitors, being now in a forward state of completion, must be broken up and sold for old metal. I say that no gentleman upon the floor, as I take it, is ready to make that assertion or plant himself upon that position, and therefore it is not necessary to discuss the question in that light. Then it follows as a natural sequence that the monitors at some time, near or distant, will be finished; and the question we are confronted with is what?

Shall we go on and build ships now, or shall we put it off to some other time?

It is known to the House and has been iterated and reiterated on the floor many times during the last session of Congress that an appropriation of money was made to purchase certain armament and equipments for the four ironclads, the Puritan, the Terror, the Amphitrite, and the Monadnock. Contracts were made for the completion of three of them, and the work is now in an advanced state of progress. As to the Monadnock, it is upon the Pacific Slope, and out of deference to the wishes of the committee the Secretary of the Navy deferred making any contract for the completion of that monitor, and it remains now just as it was several years ago, upon the stocks in the ship-yard at that point. So that, Mr. Speaker, the question is: Shall this House stop now and proceed no further either in finishing the monitors or trying to build up a navy by the construction of these additional cruisers recommended in the amendment of the Senate?

Now, the objection assigned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, first, that these four vessels, the new cruisers already in a forward state of completion, namely, the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin, will be failures when they are finished, and his remarks are predicated upon what was said by Mr. Isherwood and Naval Constructor Wilson.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that these two gentlemen from the beginning have done nothing but criticise these four vessels. I admit that in the British journals some of the engineers of the English navy have criticised these steel cruisers, but I affirm that 90 per cent. of the brains of the American Navy have said that these vessels, in their judgment, will be the best of their class in the world when finished. There have been investigations made.

Mr. DINGLEY. At this point, that I may understand the question at issue, will the gentleman from Indiana inform me whether the criticism extends to the construction of the hull or simply to the construction of the engines?

Mr. CALKINS. There are three criticisms made upon these steel cruisers. The first is with reference to the way in which the engines are put into the vessels, some of the engineers declaring that the vertical position of the engines as has been recommended in these vessels will decrease their speed, will have a tendency to make them slow; they will not get the speed that was supposed would be gotten out of them when first adopted. The second is with reference to the furnace; the old way being a water furnace and these have substituted in place of a water furnace a brick furnace. Those are the two principal criticisms made upon the construction of these steel cruisers. The other criticism is upon the hull, and may be expressed by saying that the depression on either end of the cruisers (if you will allow me the expression) has been objected to by some of these engineers.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is as to the Boston and Atlanta.

Mr. CALKINS. The Boston and Atlanta—those two.

Mr. DINGLEY. But those models have been spoken of as experiments which have never been tested. Is that true?

Mr. CALKINS. They are largely experimental. That is to say, the advisory board after having examined carefully the construction of like vessels throughout the world have added certain improvements as they claim to these vessels, among which is the change adverted to. They have changed the design in the particular I have spoken of.

Mr. DINGLEY. But that is simply a depression in the decks and not in the model of the hulls.

Mr. CALKINS. The models of the hulls are not substantially changed. It is in reference to the depression of the decks that the criticism has been indulged in by these persons.

Then there is a further criticism in reference to the material which has been referred to by my chairman, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, in which it is alleged that the steel is improperly so called; that it is a poor quality; that it will not answer the purpose for which it is used. But that is all imaginary. It is simply the judgment and opinion of certain men with reference to the texture and durability of the steel used.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come back again to the point, because I shall not this morning detain the House except to get before it the exact points of controversy. For one, and I speak alone for myself, I do not care whether we get further with the monitors at this time or not. As I have already indicated, the time will come when they must be finished or must be broken up and sold as old iron; and I think no one has intimated that that step will be taken. But shall we stop in making further vessels for our Navy?

I was sorry this morning to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania refer to the fact that in the Navy Department there was an investigation in progress, which in some way, as I understood the gentleman, militated against the further expenditure of money by that Department. I am sure the gentleman will not say that the investigation proceeding in the Navy Department to-day has anything to do with new cruisers or with any department connected with them.

Mr. RANDALL. Just there I want to say we have given every dollar that was estimated for to complete these cruisers so that the test may be made. I do not want to enter upon the discussion pro and con of the conduct of the Navy Department in relation to the contracts made; for it is not pertinent, perhaps, to the subject. Moreover, it may protract debate and delay action on the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I was referring, Mr. Speaker, not to the contracts that had been made for these cruisers, or for the monitors, but to the reference which the gentleman made to the investigation which was proceeding in the Navy Department; and I said that the gentleman would not allege that there was any investigation now proceeding.

Mr. RANDALL. That has no relation, perhaps, to these cruisers or to the monitors. But it has relation to the action of every member of this House when we appropriate money to Departments wherein maladministration has been found, that we may see that proper restrictions are thrown around this expenditure.

Mr. CALKINS. The point I was making was that the reference of the gentleman to the investigation now going on in the Navy Department was foreign to the discussion here for the reason that that had no reference to these steel cruisers. But I want to say one other word while I am upon that. I will be in possession to-day of the recommendations which put Wales in the position where he was. If it is necessary the distinguished names of many members of this House and of the other body will be shown to have been appended to his recommendation for reappointment to that place. It will appear further that the present Secretary of the Navy was never in favor of his reappointment to that place. It will appear further that when he was placed in charge of that bureau he was not placed there by reason of the voluntary action of the present Secretary of the Navy.

And if there has been, as the gentleman alleges, maladministration in that bureau, the responsibility will not rest upon the present head of the Navy Department, but it will rest, if anywhere, upon those who were instrumental in putting him at the head of that bureau.

Mr. RANDALL. It will certainly rest on the bureau.

Mr. CALKINS. It will rest on those who were instrumental in putting him there. I will soon have the papers, and in due time, if necessary, will have them read for the information of the House.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Was he put in there by this administration?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; upon the recommendation of his friends who were behind him and asked to have him put there. I criticise no gentleman for recommending him. It is not the first time that men have been mistaken in their estimate of another. The world now seems to be pretty full of men who are not always reliable and do not always come up to the highest standard of morals.

What I want to say with reference to these vessels, leaving aside this matter of investigation, is that I have no doubt that this House, under the leadership of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], will refuse to build a navy. But I do not believe that the reason for that refusal is the one which the gentleman has given to the House. My judgment is that the refusal now rests largely upon a question of pride.

A MEMBER. Or temper.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; as a friend near me says, "Or temper;" let it be either way. The people of the country, without distinction of party, desire that this House shall take no backward step in building up a navy for this country. It was the pride and glory of the Democratic party when it was first on earth——

Mr. HORR. A great while ago.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; a great while ago—to have, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] said, a magnificent navy and splendid coast fortifications and defenses. The Democratic party under its present leadership, however, has not only forgotten the traditions of the party, but have come to be simply a party of criticism. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] illustrates that this morning when he comes in here and bases his argument on a criticism made by two officers of the Navy and an English engineer as opposed to the judgment of almost every other officer in the Navy of the United States.

Of course these vessels are largely experimental. I said some months ago to this House that naval architecture is not now a certain quantity. Ever since the combat between the Merrimac and the little Monitor, down in Hampton Roads, which revolutionized the navies of the world, naval architecture has been going forward in other countries, but we have stopped. This nation, having at the close of the war the best navy in the world, disposed of these vessels, and, except constructing these few monitors, which have been the subject of so much controversy, did nothing while all the other nations of the world went on with their experiments. I am not going to stop this morning to refer to the splendid navies of Italy, Spain, France, Germany, and England. It is enough to know and enough to say that the little nation of Chili, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows, deliberately insulted this nation during the first part of the present administration, and we being without vessels or guns were compelled to pocket the insult and become then, as we have remained ever since, the laughing-stock of the world.

But I do not care so much about that as I do about another matter. If one of the subjects of the British Government, no matter in what country he may be traveling, is molested, an instant demand is made by England upon that other government for redress on account of any injustice done one of her subjects. And the first occasion has yet to come when that other nation did not make instant reparation and apology.

But how is it with this nation? In the room of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House there lie to-day petitions and memorials from citizens of the United States showing that the meanest and smallest of the countries upon the face of the globe have maltreated and misused, abused, and imprisoned our citizens, and when reparation and apology have been demanded they have not been given.

And not only that, but as Admiral Schufeldt said in his testimony before the committee, whenever the commerce of this country undertakes to penetrate the semi-civilized countries of the world, where commerce can reap its greatest gains and profits, a gunboat is first required to enforce respect to our flag and regard for our sailors and merchant marine. Before we can ever build up a merchant marine in this country, before we can again place our ships on the ocean and spread our flag in the light of heaven, we must build a navy.

But I need not stop to discuss this subject. I understand perfectly well, at least I think I do, the temper of the other side of the House. I understand perfectly well that under the leadership of the gentleman who is a prominent candidate for President of the United States, and who has his great State behind him urging his claims, the fiat has gone forth that a navy shall not be built up until after the next Presidential election. If that is the position which the gentlemen on the other side choose to assume, we are ready to meet it now and at all times in the future.

But if an appeal would do any good I would like to appeal to the good sense of members, not as partisans but as Americans. I would like to ask them now not to take a step backward in the building of a navy for this country.

Two years ago we ordered the building of these four cruisers, and before winter comes they will all be launched. There will be time before a dollar of this proposed appropriation can be expended to thoroughly test each one of these cruisers, and not a dollar need be spent until they have been tested. The gentleman knows that, and if he has any fears on that subject he may put into this bill a clause that no more vessels shall be built like those we have ordered until they have been tested, which can be done before cold weather comes. But that will not suit his purpose. He knows if a clause of that kind be inserted in the bill these vessels, when a successful trial has been made, will be built under the present administration. He knows that contracts will be let immediately. He knows the work will be pushed forward; and what is desirable on his part it seems to me is delay—nothing else.

He has also intimated that he did not like to have the money expended under the present administration. My reply to that is that it is too narrow an edge to plant a great party upon. With the power in your hands to find where every dollar of this money goes, to watch and guard its expenditure as you have done and may do with a majority in this House, you know that the money will not be misapplied; that it can not be misapplied without the delinquent being brought to justice at once. That is not your purpose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this amendment of the Senate be defeated and no appropriation be made for building more cruisers, of course it means delay for a year in building up our Navy. It means, in other words, a step backward. I say to this House, I say to the country deliberately, that I believe if the gentleman from Pennsylvania was anxious to build a navy, to advance the interest of the country, and not to retrogade, he could in twenty minutes draft an amendment with reference to these new cruisers so as to meet the judgment of both sides of the House—without reference to the monitors, for I am not very particular about them. But that is not his purpose. It seems to me that his purpose simply is to say to the country that no navy shall be built till the Democratic party has another chance to come into power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know what will be the final result of a vote on these two propositions. At the proper time I desire to test the sense of the House upon the propositions separately, one for the monitors and the other for these new cruisers. I shall ask the House (as the gentleman has already indicated he will do) to say decisively what it proposes to do. Of course I can not speak for the other branch of Congress; it would not be proper for me to undertake to do so, but I know what I would do if I were the controlling spirit in that body—I would stand by the provisions for these new steel cruisers, no matter what might be the determination of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me a moment? I understand him to say that the principal objection to the appropriation which is at present the subject of contention is, first, the fear lest the present set of cruisers may prove to be a failure, and therefore the gentleman desires no others built upon those models; and, secondly, that more safeguards need to be thrown about the expenditure of the money. I hope the gentleman will be kind enough to state to the House why he does not cure those objections by proposing amendments to the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I have expressed myself very fully upon those points. In conclusion, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] that I do not believe, as he believes, that the dignity of the American citizen has in any part of the civilized world been seriously encroached upon by any nation.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can perhaps indicate the instances to which he refers, and when he has done so I would say in reply that it was not the happy fortune of the people represented on this side of the House to be able to deal with any nation that may have shown a disposition to transgress in that way. As an instance of the moral attitude of the American people, I want to say that it was an American minister who was selected by the two great powers, Germany and France, to regulate around Paris the matters of surrender and accommodation between those two countries.

I wish to say further that my experience in traveling in foreign lands has shown me that where an American citizen behaves himself he receives unbounded respect; when he utters the words, "I am an American citizen," they are a passport to respect and honor everywhere. [Applause].

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will allow me, I think his honored colleague [Mr. CURTIN] who sits near him will say that the petition of Mr. Wheelock is now in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, representing that he was arrested in Venezuela——

Mr. RANDALL. And, sir, what was your administration about? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CALKINS. No administration can enforce the dignity of this Government unless its Legislature will put into the hands of the administration the gun-boats, the naval power, to enforce the rights of American citizens. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL. Did your administration ever appeal to this House for force to vindicate the honor and dignity of the nation?

Mr. CALKINS. Repeatedly.

Mr. RANDALL. If I know the American heart; if I know the sentiment of members of this House, whether from the North or from the South, I say, whenever an appeal of that kind comes from any administration, no matter what may be our personal feeling toward it, there will be but one voice and one vote here in defense of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. You have that opportunity now, and your vote is in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL. Why? Because you want to construct vessels which we believe the experience of twelve months will indicate are not equal to the second-class armament of other nations.

Mr. REED. Then why did you not make the necessary amendments to build vessels that are good? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL. Your party had possession of the last Congress; and yet it deliberately and with intent, with light and knowledge, under the leadership of the gentleman who sits near the gentleman from Maine, and within my sight, refused to vote for the completion of any of these monitors. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York for ten minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, this matter has taken somewhat of a partisan tinge. I regret that our Republican brethren at Chicago the other day made the increase in the growth of a navy a part of its partisan platform. For I am sure, sir, no man of American mind, mold, and spirit would in any way prevent a proper navy from being built.

The Secretary recommended to Congress at least seven modern vessels should be built in each year for ten years, until the Government had acquired a new steel navy. The annual expenditure would be $4,000,000. That amount of $4,000,000 a year requires an expenditure for such a navy, "so-called," of $40,000,000.

But we find on examination that there are four vessels already in progress. They are alleged to be faulty. This is sustained by the judgment of the experts themselves; and therefore we desire to call a halt until we ascertain from skillful men just what the naval and moneyed results of this vast expenditure may be.

I said very feebly yesterday what I say to-day more vigorously, that I would rather have one good large iron-clad steamer at a cost of $4,000,000 than your whole fleet of forty-million-dollar cruisers. These cruisers can not fight the present iron-clad vessels of the world. To make these vessels, according to Admiral Porter, able to compete with the vessels of the world—this is the crucial test of a navy worth having—the Admiral says:

> I am nevertheless well satisfied that it would be most unwise to vote $4,000,000 for the construction of seven steel cruisers next year until we have some evidence that the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin are of the proper type or types to enable our naval officers "to keep alive the knowledge of war."

And he asks:

> Are these the types of ships that are "capable on brief notice of being expanded into invincible squadrons?"

I perceive the emphasis of the recommendation of your great Admiral. I would not go back on that recommendation, nor on the testimony of your skilled and ingenious builders and engineers. I would not in a time when this armament is growing——

Mr. REED. Let me interrupt the gentleman for one moment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is it not proposed in this amendment we are discussing to have vessels according to the plan of the Admiral whose testimony you are quoting?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir; I am talking about the four cruisers.

Mr. REED. But permit me; is not that one of the propositions we are discussing and deciding by the very Admiral whose testimony you quote?

Mr. COX, of New York. That came in here one Monday and was defeated—perhaps unwisely.

Mr. REED. Is it not in this particular bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. That is not the proposition I am now debating.

Mr. REED. Is it not in the bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. It may be in the bill.

Mr. REED. Is it not in the bill we are debating?

Mr. COX, of New York. It may be.

Mr. REED. Thanks for that concession.

Mr. COX, of New York. I was following what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], namely, the points of difference between the Senate and the House. They have reference to two subjects: first, the monitors, and second, these cruisers. I think I may say that we are justified in refusing to concede the expenditure of these large sums when the monitors on the one side are regarded as useless in the opinion of many, and when the cruisers have not been sufficiently tested, or if tested, do not fill the idea of a navy revival. If the Chicago platform means this, some one has been wofully deficient in navigating the tempestuous politics.

Regarding our ability to command our position in the world I know we were stronger in the world's esteem, we were greater in national character in that old time when Democrats had a naval force respected abroad and commanded abroad. I refer to the time of Koszta in Smyrna Harbor. I refer to the ever heroic Ingraham, who in those Democratic days vindicated the American rights of a semi-naturalized man, when pursued by Austrian tyranny, and challenged the admiration of the world in behalf of this signal defense of our citizenship and flag when molested in a Mediterranean port. But the way, sir, to vindicate our supremacy is not by building mere commerce destroyers. The way to do it is, according to the best judgment and experience of the best men of our age of invention, let us build ironclads, sir, one or more, for the present if you please, of sufficient strength and caliber in their guns to protect our commerce and screen our harbors and coasts. Then we can command the respect of mankind.

This voting of money for the construction of these fightless and flighty cruisers may give to our officers many a holiday under foreign skies, but the work will be like pouring water in a sieve. It will have no possible good effect.

My distinguished friend on the other side, the candidate for governor of Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], speaks well for his party. He allowed truth to creep unaware upon his party caution when he carelessly said that our side of the House was opposed to building a navy, and then immediately, almost in a breath, he corrected himself by saying, "I mean building these cruisers." For is it not clearly understood that there is in the judgment of this House, as well as of others, a vast difference between building a navy of the kind that should be built for our credit, honor, and character, and these cruisers, that are only chasing vessels, trade annihilators, and not in any sense fighting vessels.

So far as building up a navy for proper defenses and strengthening our harbors and coasts by fortifications, I am with my distinguished friend from Indiana; I will vote for proper fortifications and for iron-clad ships; so I indicated yesterday. I may go further than some other members on this side; but I am unwilling to vote away the public moneys for useless vessels, which will be utterly powerless to defend the nation in case of peril, and useless upon the sea, so far as defending our honor and protecting our citizenship and commerce abroad.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask my distinguished friend from New York: Suppose that I should propose an amendment to build one such vessel as the gentleman himself suggests, could I depend upon him to follow me in that direction?

Mr. COX, of New York. I will vote for such an amendment, for the reasons I gave abundantly yesterday. I said so yesterday; I have said so time and again. If my friend will do me the honor to read my speech, which is printed carefully in this morning's RECORD, he will see that I stand identically on that position now.

What does Admiral Porter say? And I have quoted him very liberally in that speech. He says that vessels like the Alaska and the Oregon, which are capable of a speed of eighteen or nineteen knots an hour, can be turned into armed cruisers in a twinkling. They can not be affected by the cruisers we are building. He intimates that these cruisers would be mere popguns against the machine-guns and new ships of other nations. What we want to meet that kind of a ship in conflict are such ironclad ships of war with such equipment as the recent Brazilian vessel. What we want to compete in fight with new vessels and armor is such a ship as Admiral Simpson has recommended, and whose recommendation upon the advanced engineering plans of the present day might in a short time amply protect the honor of our flag, and be useful, if not indispensable, in case of any emergency.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, three minutes will be all I desire simply to correct the position taken by my friend from Indiana. I wish to state to him and to the House that there is no case pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House but what could be settled in our own way. Not only that, but there is no necessity of ironclads of any character to protect the great interests of American citizens, so far as the Committee on Foreign Affairs are aware.

Mr. CALKINS. If my friend from Connecticut will pardon me that is not my position. The point was that if we had a navy and demanded satisfaction for outrages upon our citizens, these countries would not have dared to deny us.

Mr. EATON. It is not a case of navies or ironclads; it is a case of the administration of the Department. The Department of State is dilatory; that is all. The little trouble some time ago with the Argentine Republic and a citizen of the United States who had not been properly treated in that republic did not require the presence of gunboats or ironclads. The State Department could manage it all. A canoe is all you want to determine differences between this country and those little republics. I repeat, the trouble is in the State Department; it is not any difficulty with regard to our Navy, so far as the American character is concerned, in any of these South American republics. Let us not unnecessarily belittle ourselves here. I tried for two months to get the truth from the State Department with regard to an American citizen maltreated in one of these republics of the South, and did not succeed in getting it until I said I would bring the matter before the House unless I could get that information.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I now demand the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move, in order to test the sense of the House, that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 44; and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. CALKINS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement.

Mr. RANDALL. That motion, of course, has precedence. Let us have the yeas and nays.

It is suggested to me to embrace the two amendments, 44 and 48. The question can be divided.

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. RANDALL. A separate vote will be taken on each.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Indiana moves that the House recede from its disagreement and agree to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. That motion has priority.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to be heard a moment on my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I have control of the subject and have demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded the previous question. That precludes any debate according to the practice of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. But my motion has priority, and is open to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion has priority according to the practice of the House, but the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. CALKINS. Does the Chair hold that the previous question is operating on my motion?

Mr. REED. Has not the previous question been executed?

Mr. RANDALL. I insist on the previous question on the motion that the House further insist on its disagreement. I concede that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is a prior motion, but it does not take from me the control of the subject nor the authority under the rule to call the previous question on both motions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the practice of the House to be read as it has been settled in more than one Congress. The Clerk will read from page 271 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

Though the previous question may be pending on a motion to insist or to adhere, a motion to recede, which removes the disagreement between the Houses and passes the bill, may be made, but is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. That is the practice of the House.

Mr. REED. Has there been any motion for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment he demanded the previous question, and pending that the gentleman from Indiana moved to recede.

Mr. RANDALL. I have conceded that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana has priority; but that does not take from me the control of the subject.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment of the Senate (No. 44) was read, as follows:

(44) To enable the President to strengthen the naval establishment of the United States the sum of $2,500,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended as follows and under the following limitations: For the construction of one cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily-armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and one light gunboat of seven hundred and fifty tons, and one gunboat, not to exceed nine hundred tons; this boat to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy; one steel ram, as recommended by the first naval advisory board, November 7, 1881; one cruising torpedo-boat, advocated by the same board and by the present advisory board in its memorandum of November 21, 1882; and two of the harbor torpedo-boats recommended by said first board and in the report from the Bureau of Ordnance of November 1, 1883, all of which are recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy. And, under existing law, it shall be the duty of the advisory board appointed in conformity with an act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved August 5, 1882, to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein, and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract, nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor. Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced, or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $500, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board, or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes. And for the construction of all which vessels the Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals from all American ship-builders and builders of machinery who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract their ship-yards will be equipped for building and repairing iron and steel steamships, and constructors of marine engines, machinery, and boilers; and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board; and in the event that such vessels, or any of them, shall be built by contract such building shall be under contract with the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for constructing said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board, and in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, except as they are hereby modified; and the authority to construct the same shall take effect at once: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use, in the building of said ships, or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. I will ask the Chair whether under the third clause of Rule XXVIII thirty minutes are not allowed for debate on this subject, no debate having taken place upon it?

Mr. RANDALL. Debate has taken place.

Mr. CALKINS. The debate took place on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that rule applies. While it is true there has been some debate on these propositions there has been no debate on the pending motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the rule be read.

The Clerk read clause 3 of Rule XXVIII, as follows:

When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been debate.

The SPEAKER. There has been debate on these propositions but not on the gentleman's motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the previous question has not yet been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, under the rule thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Everybody here recognizes the hopelessness of the main question; but at the same time it may be very desirable that the reasons which have been given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be investigated. It is not to be supposed for a moment that he gave those reasons for the purpose of influencing his side of the House. It is to be supposed rather that he gave them for the purpose of concealing from the country the true issue presented.

Among the grounds on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his speech bases his action are: First, that this bill is not surrounded by the proper safeguards as to the expenditure of money; second, the fear lest ships shall be built upon a model that shall prove to be a disastrous model for ships of the Navy.

Now, let us look at these grounds and see what they amount to. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not only at the head of the conference committee, he is not only at the head of the Committee on Appropriations, but he is the true controlling leader of the House of Representatives, and if his desire was to build a navy it is in his power to make the necessary modifications to remove his own objections. In other words, the only grounds on which he bases his opposition to these amendments are grounds which he could cut out from under it at any moment.

The country will judge of the sincerity of the pretext which has been presented here. I call the attention of this House to one other occurrence which has taken place in its presence. I demanded of the gentleman, in the midst of his declamation about the willingness of his side to vote everything that was demanded by the Administration as necessary for the preservation and honor of the country, why he did not do it now when they were demanding it upon this very bill; and what was his answer? His answer was that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] did not in the last Congress put in an appropriation to finish the monitors. Those are the arguments with which the gentleman treats the House and the country; and I submit that it is legitimate and proper to expose them.

I do not make any declarations that are injurious to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I mean to make no reflections upon him, but only upon the arguments as he presents them here to the House. And I say that they lead legitimately to the conjoined result of the conclusions of the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Tennessee, who some time ago addressed this House—and I congratulate the Democratic party upon the advance they have made. The last declaration made by the gentleman from Tennessee was that the proper navy for the United States was a couple of logs with the Ameriaan flag fastened to them. And the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has to-day advanced as far as a canoe. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing that the country should judge.

Mr. CALKINS. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], if he desires to go on. Of course I wish to reserve, say, five minutes of my time to myself.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to go on now.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I would inquire how much time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I simply desire to emphasize what has just been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] by specifying and enumerating three or four of the objections which have been made to these cruisers, and it will not take more than three minutes to do that.

First, it is said that the Chicago should have full sail power. I say that it is only fair, before this appropriation is refused, to propose an amendment to the bill by which any new vessel of that type shall be constructed on that plan. I declare that I will myself vote for such an amendment.

Secondly, it is said that the Boston and Atlanta are cut down on the deck fore and aft in order to give a fore-and-aft range to their guns, and therefore they could not live in a heavy sea. If that be the case, then it is your duty to provide that all new vessels of that size and type should be constructed in the other way, exactly as Mr. Isherwood says they ought to be, with a high forecastle and a high poop-deck. It is not fair to put this disagreement on that ground unless you put in an amendment providing that new vessels shall be made so as to obviate that particular criticism.

The third criticism that has been made is one by an English periodical in regard to the engines and boilers on the Chicago, and perhaps on one of the other vessels. That criticism can be obviated by an amendment which can easily be made, and it should be made before an appropriation is passed or any attempt made to continue the building of vessels like them. Beyond these three objections I do not know of any which has been made that is entitled to serious consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. I will now reserve the balance of my time until the other side has been heard.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like the Chair to rule on that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the vote, unless some gentleman seeks to address the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I see nothing to answer.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] means that he sees nothing that he can answer.

Mr. RANDALL. I prefer to take the vote.

Mr. REED. I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. RANDALL. I have great respect for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], for his ingenuity, wit, and general good character; but I do not think he has said anything that was serious enough to require an answer.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman has great respect, and he shows it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has nine minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CALKINS. If it is not the purpose of the gentlemen on the other side to debate the matter further, I do not desire to take up further time of the House in the discussion.

The SPEAKER. No further debate being desired, the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 90, nays 147, not voting 87; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CALKINS was not agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. I voted ay, and withdraw my vote on account of being paired with Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. COSGROVE, is quite ill at his hotel.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. KETCHAM, on the fortification and naval appropriation bills.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. ELLIS, on this question.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions for this day:

Mr. FIEDLER with Mr. HOLMES.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. COSGROVE with Mr. BELFORD.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. RANKIN with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.

Mr. MURRAY with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HURD with Mr. RICE.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. MOULTON with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. BOYLE with Mr. LAWRENCE.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, with Mr. LACEY.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. KEAN.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, with Mr. HOOPER.

Mr. DUNCAN with Mr. SMITH.

Mr. DOCKERY with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. JOHN S. WISE.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, with Mr. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. BARR.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. BISBEE with Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR.

Mr. SHAW with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. WORTHINGTON with Mr. BOWEN.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. BREITUNG.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. PETTIBONE.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion of Mr. CALKINS was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 44. Does the gentleman include in his motion a request for a further conference?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir. I desire to expedite matters as much as possible.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for a vote on the forty-eighth amendment; and I demand the previous question.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to recede with an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 48, and upon that motion demands the previous question.

Mr. CALKINS. And I move to recede.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the question on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out amendment numbered 48, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the four monitors, known as the Puritan, Terror, Amphitrite, and Monadnock, be, and they are hereby, ordered to be sold, after proper advertisement, at the best price obtainable at public auction, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and after paying the expenses of advertisement and sale the residue of the money realized therefrom shall be immediately covered into the Treasury."

Mr. RANDALL. I raise a point of order on the amendment, that the previous question was called before the motion of the gentleman from Indiana was submitted.

Mr. CALKINS. That question was ruled on a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. But the point of order is not that the gentleman may not make a motion to recede from the disagreement to the amendment and agree to the same, but that the previous question having been demanded, and ordered, it is not in order for him to move to recede and agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment. The point of order is against the amendment, not against the motion to recede.

Mr. RANDALL. The only course for the gentleman to accomplish his object is to get the House to vote down the previous question.

Mr. CALKINS. Then the Chair holds that at this stage the amendment can not be offered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. CALKINS. Then the fact that a motion to recede takes precedence over a motion to insist does not carry with it the right to make a motion to recede with an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, when the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. If the House concurs in the purpose of the gentleman it can vote down the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered by a vote of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, the Chair will hear the gentleman. The Chair is simply stating its present impression, not deciding the point.

Mr. CALKINS. I submit to the Chair that this amendment is a mere incident to the motion to recede; and if the motion to recede (which the Chair has ruled takes precedence) is in order, it carries with it the right to amend as an incident.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to recede is in order, and has precedence simply because it tends to bring the two Houses to an agreement and secure the passage of the bill. For that reason, and for that reason alone, it is a privileged motion, having precedence of the motion to insist on the disagreement.

Now, the gentleman's motion just submitted would not bring the two Houses to an agreement, but would still leave further action to be taken by them before they could be brought to an agreement.

Mr. CALKINS. The point I make is this, that the motion to recede is not destroyed by reason of the previous question, and therefore any motion which can be made as a part of the motion to recede is in order, notwithstanding the previous question has been ordered, and for the reason that this motion does not become imperfect in any way by reason of the amendment. The reason stated by the chairman is not the only one which makes the motion to recede a proper one.

The SPEAKER. It is not the only reason which makes the motion to recede a proper motion in the first instance, but it is the only reason which makes the motion to recede a proper motion after the other motion has been made and gives it preference over it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the motion to recede in order after the previous question has been ordered?

Mr. CALKINS. The Chair has ruled that it is.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question has been ordered a motion to recede from a disagreement to an amendment and agree to the same has always been held to be in order, and has priority over the motion to insist; but the Chair does not think that a motion to recede with an amendment, which is a motion that does not bring the two Houses to an agreement, can be entertained after the motion has been made to insist and after the previous question has been demanded or ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. The object of the previous question is to enable the House to come to a direct vote.

Mr. CALKINS. Of course I do not care anything about the ruling of the Chair except as it may relate to a proper exposition of the rules; but I say, in all deference to the Chair, so far as my remembrance goes it has been the universal practice in this House that you may not only move to recede, but recede with an amendment for the purpose of lessening whatever disagreement may exist between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. A motion to recede from a disagreement in an amendment and agree to the same is allowed to have precedence over a motion to recede on the disagreement simply, because the effect of that motion is to bring the two Houses to an agreement and disposition of the matter. But the motion which the gentleman makes does not bring the two Houses to an agreement, but simply proposes that the House shall recede from its disagreement on a certain amendment with an amendment to which the Senate has not heretofore agreed.

Mr. RANDALL. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman to recede and to agree to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CALKINS. Does the gentleman sustain the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does.

Mr. CALKINS. Protesting against it, Mr. Speaker, I yield to it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to recede?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; I move to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 48 and agree to the same.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 139, not voting 100; as follows:

So the motion to recede was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CALKINS, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. HOLTON, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to recede was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask a further conference thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to save time, I ask that the conference be now appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as managers on the part of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, and, in the absence of the gentleman from New York, Mr. HUTCHINS, who has heretofore been the manager on the part of the House, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CALKINS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I find in an article printed in the New York Tribune of this morning, with relation to the improvement of New York Harbor, it has a heading alleging that that harbor is to be excluded from all participation in the improvements on account of Southern resentment because the Mississippi River does not get all it wants. This article is dated Washington, D. C., June 30, and I send it to the desk, asking the Clerk to read the last paragraph only. It is brief.

The Clerk read as follows:

A BLOW AT NEW YORK CITY.

This course embittered the Southern statesmen, and they showed their resentment in a characteristic manner. Scarcely had the Senate amendment been reached, providing for the protection of New York Harbor and for the appointment of a "board of superintendence," than Senator MORGAN objected to its consideration on the ground that it was new legislation, and as such was out of order. The point of order was sustained by Mr. HARRIS, who was in the chair. This important amendment, therefore, goes by the board, and it seems doubtful whether anything will be done or can be accomplished for the preservation of New York Harbor at this session of Congress. For this failure to do anything New York will have to thank, among others, S. S. COX, who is said to have requested Senator MORGAN to make the point of order which defeated the Senate amendment, for no other reason than that his feelings were hurt at seeing his loosely drawn and ridiculously worded provision in the bill corrected and put in shape by the Senate. The business interests of the country at large, which are more or less interested in the preservation of the harbor of New York, through which enter three-fourths of the imports from abroad, and from which a still larger proportion, perhaps, of exports is shipped yearly to foreign ports, will also know that it was a Southern Democrat, who, on a mere point of order, and probably to satisfy personal resentment, defeated legislation which is of paramount importance, it may justly be said, to the entire country.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, my attention was called to this matter a few moments since by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]. He is chairman of the River and Harbor Committee and was not less astonished at the flagrant and false statements than I was.

Mr. KEIFER. Is that a privileged matter?

Mr. COX, of New York. If the gentleman will hear me I think he will see that it is. I never made a point against that member when he was in trouble. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks what has been read scarcely comes within the rule as a question of personal privilege.

Mr. COX, of New York. Allow me to give my reason for presenting this as a question of personal privilege. It contains a personal objurgation.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman is very anxious to deny the statement, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Then, without objection, the gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, it appears from this statement that from some alleged resentment Senator MORGAN made a point of order on the New York Harbor amendment to the river and harbor bill. The point made was that it was new legislation. The amendment was accordingly ruled out by the presiding officer on that ground. I understand the point was properly sustained. I understand this from the honorable Senator MCMILLAN, with whom I conferred about it. It was ruled under a strict and exacting rule recently adopted in the Senate. I saw Senator MCMILLAN this morning. He informed me that the point of order was made by Senator MORGAN, but it does not follow as a necessary consequence that nothing will be done or accomplished in the direction of the improvement of the New York Harbor during this session. It is still open for conference, and it will be I trust so considered under the ruling of the presiding officer of the Senate.

For this failure—

Says this libeler in the Tribune—

New York city may have to thank among others S. S. COX, who is said to have requested Senator MORGAN to make the point of order which defeated the Senate amendment.

And consequently, as it would appear, against my own city and its interests. This, sir, if it were true, charges or implies base hypocrisy, dereliction of duty, and most deceitful malevolence. These qualities could only be found in the person who utters the base and baseless statement.

The man who made this libel about myself and Senator MORGAN must have been informed of it by the Senators named or by outsiders, who could not know except from them. The Senators who could know will give the lie to it. They are honorable men, too honorable to fabricate such a statement about any one. I have not seen Senator MILLER at all about this action of the Senate. I tried to see him last night and failed.

I saw his colleague on the committee, Senator MCMILLAN, who explained what had been done and that it might yet come into conference and pass. Senator MILLER has my notes and papers on this subject—those sent me by officers and the mayor of New York. I wrote to him, inclosing them, with the request to add to the House bill the appropriation of $30,000, which I did not offer in the House because of the peril of a point of order. Senator MILLER will say that I requested him in writing before this base fabrication reached this city to insist, if possible, upon the amendment, so as to protect New York Harbor, and by all means to insist upon the appropriation.

The Senator dropped me a note informing me that the appropriation was already made. He wrote this:

SENATE UNITED STATES.

MY DEAR MR. COX: Thirty thousand has been added for the protection of the harbor and for a survey.

Yours,

WARNER MILLER.

The Tribune falsifier intimates that I killed the matter, and the editor himself more than intimates the slander, because, forsooth, my feelings were hurt at seeing my "loosely drawn" and "ridiculously worded" provision in the bill corrected and put into shape by the Senate! Why, sir, neither Mr. MORGAN, I presume, nor any one else, certainly not myself, displayed any personal resentment. I might have felt a little amour propre about my amendment, but it was substantially adopted by the Senate committee. It was not confessed by me to be incomplete. It was very nearly right, lacking only the appropriation. I promised to have it perfected in the Senate if I could. At once I sent all the papers, including the amendment inserted by the Senate, to Senator MILLER. He displayed his usual alacrity and vigilance in the affair.

The gentleman from Kentucky who had charge of the bill has told me that he knows that amendment would not have been on the river and harbor bill but for my urgency, and I may add the aid of my gallant friend from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

It is not a pleasant task to remain here in all weathers, to lose all the delectations of national conventions and the comforts of home to aid your constituents and their interests, and then to be slandered without a shadow of foundation or truth or a single pretext of decency. Very likely I may trace this, as I have some other statements, to some who do nothing here but play a base part as to the members and repeat falsehoods to aggrandize their own importance by derogating from the services of others.

It is rather vexatious when I have done what I could here and in the Senate for my city and its interests to have this malignant libel uttered. It is, I presume, a man who looks down on us here from the galleries. He ought to look up from below. If this man be found to be a slanderer, under our courtesy or that of the Senate, he ought to be removed in disgrace from the gallery. That is all I have to say.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to make a privileged report. I send to the Clerk's desk the report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 11, and 17 to House bill 5459 making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

R. W. TOWNSHEND,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
R. G. HORR,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. B. PLUMB,
W. B. ALLISON,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement accompanying the report will be read.

The statement was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year 1885, submit the following written statement in explanation of the accompanying conference report:

The conference committee having been unable to agree, the bill, if the report is adopted, will be before the House for action on the amendments of the Senate, and in the same condition as when last considered by the House.

R. W. TOWNSHEND,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
R. G. HORR,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND addressed the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague will allow me a moment I will say I do not see the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] on the floor. I suggest to my colleague to allow this to be passed over till the gentleman comes in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I gave the gentleman from Michigan notice that I would bring it up, but if it is the desire of my colleague I am willing to let the report be passed over for the present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the report for the present?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have brought it up partly at the solicitation of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the duty of members to be present. There are two bills involving the same matter of disagreement, the Army and Post-Office appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I intimated to the gentleman from Michigan that I would present this report as soon as we were through with the naval appropriation bill. I do not know why he is not in his seat.

Mr. RANDALL. We must go on.

Mr. HAMMOND. I saw the gentleman from Michigan a few moments ago. He was desirous of having this report taken up.

Mr. HORR here entered the Hall.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The points of disagreement are amendments 10, 11, and 17, being the same amendments which were voted upon by this House when the former conference report was presented. They embrace all the grounds of disagreement on this bill between the two Houses. The appropriation by the House for the transportation of mail over the railroads was $11,700,000; the amount provided by amendment 10 of the Senate is $12,750,000, making a difference of about $1,000,000. Amendment 11 is to strike out the provision in the House bill reducing the rate of compensation for carrying the mail on all the railroads generally 5 per cent. Another amendment strikes out the provision agreed to by the House that the rate for transportation of mails on the land-grant and bonded railroads shall be reduced 50 per cent.

Mr. HORR. That is all in the same amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You may call it the same amendment. There are two different provisions in the same amendment. The third point of difference is on the compensation of railway mail clerks. The amount provided by the House bill was $4,000,000. The Senate has raised that amount $300,000. These were the three points of difference submitted to the conference by the last vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois for his own information if these are the only amendments now pending?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They are the only amendments now pending between the two Houses. All the other amendments were disposed of in conference and a report made upon them, which was agreed to by both Houses. The only points of difference now are those I have mentioned. They are the three points on which the House acted and by yea-and-nay vote decided to disagree when the former report from the conference committee was made.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. The first amendment makes a difference in the amount to be paid for carrying the mails on railroads. Does not that difference grow out of the difference in the rates of compensation upon which there is a disagreement between the Houses, the House insisting on a reduction of the rate of compensation?

Mr. HORR. The gentleman is correct. That covers every dollar of the difference.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then practically there are only two questions of difference pending?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was about to state that the first amendment grows out of the reduction of the rate of compensation for carrying the mails. If the rate of percentage for carrying the mails should be reduced it is admitted even by our friends on the other side that it will be only necessary to appropriate the sum named in the original bill, $11,700,000. Therefore if we sustain these two provisions in regard to the rates of compensation, the Senate will recede also from its amendment increasing the compensation from $11,700,000 to $12,750,000.

I do not wish to occupy the attention of the House at any length. These provisions have heretofore been discussed, both when the bill was first reported from the Committee on Appropriations as well as on the last report from the committee of conference. I will simply say it is utterly impossible for the conference committee to agree upon these provisions as at present constituted. No disposition whatever is manifested by the conferees on the part of the Senate to make any reduction or any change whatever in the rate of compensation to the railroads; and so long as I am a member of this conference committee I will say frankly and candidly I can not, according to my judgment of the matter, yield the full amount of the increase demanded by the Senate. I have been willing and still am willing to meet the Senate conferees in a spirit of compromise, with a view to coming to some basis of agreement; but as they simply demand complete and absolute surrender on the part of the House I could not, as one of the conferees, agree with them on that basis, because I believe their demand unjust.

I do not wish to go over the argument again. I will say, however, that further study of this question has only the more firmly fixed me in the opinion that we are simply demanding what is reasonable, what the railroads can well afford to bear, and what justice to the people demands of us.

The report of the railway commission, which I have in my hand here, a commission appointed by the Postmaster-General to investigate this very question, declares that the amount of compensation to railroads can and ought to be reduced at least $1,000,000. That commission further reports that even if we fix the amount of compensation for mail transportation at about the same rates as paid for passenger traffic Congress can reduce the appropriation $1,000,000 without any injustice to the railroads.

I will not discuss this matter further now, but will wait until we can hear from my friends on the other side of the House. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to inquire whether he is not satisfied that the increased mileage of railroads, particularly in the West, and of the minor roads, requires an increase of appropriation for clerical railway service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is separating that from the other railroad provision. I forgot to mention in regard to the compensation of railway mail clerks that the conferees on the part of the House are willing, I may say—I think I can speak for the majority of them—to meet the Senate on more than half-way ground. I would be willing, and I think my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], will agree to do that. The Senate are asking for $300,000 more than we appropriated. I know he is willing to agree with me to increase the appropriation $150,000, and if that is done I feel that we will be making ample provision for the increased mileage and the increased demands of the service.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that this question is of special interest to many of us in the West, including my own district, where route agents have been refused upon new routes. Complaints have come to me that post-offices have been established along those routes, but that they can not get any service. If there be an estimate, as I understand there is, from the Post-Office Department of the number required to serve on these new and extended routes, then I submit that justice to the people in that portion of the country requires that the whole amount so estimated for should be granted.

That is all I desire to say, because I do not believe that gentlemen from the West would insist on depriving the people of this service where routes have been extended and post-offices have been established.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is correct in saying that we who come from the West have no desire to appropriate an insufficient amount for that service in the West or elsewhere in the United States. I will simply say, however, that the conferees on the part of the House, from their investigation of this question, believe that by yielding the sum of $150,000, in addition to the amount appropriated by the House, they will be giving enough to cover the entire increase of service demanded by the increased mileage of railroads. And we feel satisfied that if the suggestion I have just made, to increase the amount for this service $150,000, shall be adopted, then all the clerks will be provided that are needed for the efficient performance of this service.

Mr. KASSON. All that I ask is that the estimates of the Department showing what is needed should be followed. I think that is but justice to the country, and especially to the West.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That has heretofore been done on several occasions. There is a difference of opinion between some of the officers of the Post-Office Department and the commission appointed to investigate this matter. I will say that it is not customary to yield the full estimates of the Departments, for they are often made with a view of finally accepting less than is demanded. In the original bill as it passed the House we appropriated nearly $25,000 more than was appropriated for this service last year, and we believe that there is no evidence of a deficiency in that service. Yet in order to reach a harmonious conclusion the House conferees are willing to increase the appropriation $150,000, making in all an increase over the appropriation made last year of $175,000. But we have met with no favoring response from the Senate, and therefore we had only to report to the House the result of our action and to ask its judgment on our course.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman make any motion?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall before I relinquish the floor, but I supposed that the gentleman from Michigan desired to be heard.

Mr. HORR. I wish to say to the House that I do not propose to go through the lengthy argument which was made on the other report from the conference committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has stated exactly the condition of things in the conference. On this matter of railway clerks the Senate are immovable, and I violate no rule of the House by saying that they are unanimously immovable upon that question.

Why? When we consult the Post-Office Department (as I have done since the appointment of this conference committee) the officials who have this service in charge state that the amount carried by the bill as passed by the House will not pay the clerks now employed, saying nothing about the new service. Now, the officers of the Post-Office Department say that if you leave this matter as it is in the House bill they will execute the law; but how? They will keep the clerks as they now are on all the main lines of the country, but will refuse to put any additional clerks on any of the new roads that have been built during the last year. There are in the State of Mississippi alone about four hundred and fifty miles of railroad that will not get a single clerk if you persist in keeping the amount of this appropriation down to where the House has placed it. In the State of Georgia there are several new routes that will not be able to get any of this service. Now, the simple question is, whether we shall withhold this service from these new routes reaching out into the new portions of our country, or whether we shall appropriate a sum sufficient to carry this service all over the United States. One hundred and forty-three new clerks are needed on these new roads alone. Will my friend from Illinois tell me how we are going to get them under this proposition?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not think they are necessary.

Mr. HORR. It is true. The Department says so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the question.

Mr. HORR. The men who run this service say that either they must have this money or the service must do without these clerks. These officers know more about this business than the gentleman from Illinois or myself can know. Not only that, but the increase of the mails on several routes requires a large number of new clerks for the business of distribution.

Now, is the American Congress going to sit down and refuse to deliver the mails to the people of this country? I submit to you gentlemen on the other side of the House, can you afford to do that? If you can, then ride your wagon right along. [Laughter.] I am tired of this higgling over a matter which is for the benefit of the people who pay the postage. This money does not come out of the general Treasury. The people who write the letters and read the newspapers pay for this service; and all they ask is that you men on the other side of the House (for we are a unit on our side) shall deliver to them the mails that they pay for carrying. That is all there is of this question. If you propose to tie up the mails of this country just for the sake of political capital, do so. The Senate say they will not yield. You ought not to ask them to yield.

I know my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] undertook to help us out of the trouble the other day by the suggestion in his speech that the only way to remedy this difficulty was for the Postmaster-General to commence to cut down the salaries of those now in the service, and with the amount thus saved hire additional men. I do not misstate your position, do I [addressing Mr. HOLMAN]? Now, the Postmaster-General says that these men are getting less than they earn. If you want to cut down anybody, why not cut down you and me, Brother HOLMAN?

Mr. WELLER. I would like to do that.

Mr. HORR. You would like to do it, because your services are not worth anything; but mine are. [Laughter.] I do not blame you for feeling cheap about the money you are taking; but I have a feeling that I earn my salary and am entitled to it.

Mr. WELLER. You evidently are speaking from the standpoint of a latter-day Republican and in error, as might be expected. I would cut all high official salaries down to the level of the working classes.

Mr. NEECE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEECE. I want to be correctly informed on this question, for I want to vote conscientiously.

Mr. HORR. All right.

Mr. NEECE. Will you tell me whether you have investigated the expenditures of the Post-Office Department to see whether the money is economically expended?

Mr. HORR. I have.

Mr. NEECE. Has the gentleman examined the accounts of the disbursing clerk of the Post-Office Department since 1881, and can he tell us in what manner those accounts have been kept?

Mr. HORR. I have not. So far as I can learn, there has been a man in that Department who has stolen a lot of money; and we are after him and intend to punish him. You want us to do that, do you not?

Mr. NEECE. Not only that, but I want to have the accounts properly kept and looked after.

Mr. HORR. Well, we are trying to do that.

Now, in regard to this postal service, think a moment! For what amount do we carry a letter anywhere over the United States? For 2 cents. And for any newspaper not exceeding a certain weight we charge 1 cent, wherever in the United States it may be carried. Some of these letters cost $5 to carry them to their destination, but the sender pays only 2 cents. This is what led me to investigate the matter of railroad transportation of the mails. I knew that any Department that could do its work as cheaply as our post-office work is being done to-day must be run economically. No private individual could take charge of the post-offices of the United States and run them as cheaply as they are being run to-day. Our postal service is the cheapest known to the world.

My friend from Illinois says that Great Britain makes money out of her post-offices. That is true. But Great Britain has but 121,000 square miles over which to carry the mails, while the United States has 3,000,000 square miles. Our Post-Office Department has about twenty times as much territory over which to extend its operations. Yet a letter started from any point in the United States can be sent over the Sierras and the Rocky Mountains to the most distant point in the country for 2 cents—take it everywhere; and now the Democratic party in this House stand up before the world and say, in the interest of economy, "We will not let you have your letters, we will not give you any clerks to distribute them. Oh, yes, we will pay enough to give to the big roads so Philadelphia and my friend's district shall get their mail."

Mr. RANDALL. I did not vote for that.

Mr. HORR. Why?

Mr. RANDALL. I did not vote for my own city, because I thought they asked what it was not right they should have.

Mr. HORR. Probably they were right and you were wrong. Probably they did not ask for more than they should have. You gentlemen say you will give these letters to you men, but you do not say you will give them to the poor part of Mississippi. You men who live way off on the waste places and wilds of New Mexico, you shall not have your mails; we will cut down this appropriation until we will cripple the service and prevent the carriage and delivery of these mails.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, all I want to about that. It does not seem to me there could be any more question about it. There are only two points involved, and the other point of difference is the cutting down of railroads. I made a statement to the House the other day showing why 1,300 out of 1,500 railroads in the United States are getting barely nothing for the work they are now doing in carrying the mails. One member from Mississippi tells me the mails on the roads in his district do not pay as much for being carried on passenger roads as they pay for carrying lumber. I have no doubt that is true.

It is a simple question. The Senate refused to yield. Why? They say we have reduced these roads beyond a living point. They are doing this work for nothing, and the simple question is whether we on the part of the House shall stand here and hold this Congress in session for what? Why, to punish the railroad companies. And my friend here sought the floor and made a speech, and after weeks of study he has not been able to answer a single position I took. He did not show you a single road that got a dollar more than I said it got. Why did he not do so? Because he can not. That is a good reason. I have been in that fix myself before now where I could not make an answer; and the only cause was there was not any to make. It will happen to all men every once in a while in this country; and my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] knows the reason he did not show to this House the statements I made in reference to the pay now received by these railroad companies were wrong. The reason he did not answer that was because he knows very well they are getting to-day almost nothing comparatively for the service they are performing. He knows they are getting barely nothing for the work they are doing. I mean the poorer roads. There are eight hundred of them.

The gentleman says, why do they do it? That is a fair question. Simply because they can not help themselves. The land-grant roads are compelled to do it, and the other roads are forced by public opinion to do it. It is their custom. Railroads live by the aid of the people along their lines. They can not refuse to carry the mails even if they carry them for nothing, because public opinion would not permit it. But is that any reason why we should play the extortioner with them? Should we not at least treat them decently? Ought they not to get for their work what it is worth? Are they not entitled to pay for what they do? Come, now; is not that so? The gentleman says they are. If that is the case, then this question is ended and I leave the House to do with the matter what it pleases. I move to recede. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will take the floor and yield for five minutes to my colleague [Mr. NEECE].

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote for every dollar that is necessary to secure every railway mail clerk that the service demands, but just how we are to determine that fact I am at a loss to know. I fear that the House bill does not give money enough for that purpose, and yet I am afraid to indorse the Senate amendment. My friend from Michigan is an enthusiast; he favors the increase of every appropriation and he seems to be more interested in getting large appropriations than he is in looking after the expenditure of the money after it is appropriated. The appropriations heretofore made for the postal service have been recklessly managed, and those whose duty it was to see to the expenditure of the money for that service have failed to discharge that duty.

I do not mean the present Postmaster-General, for I believe he is a gentleman who desires to and will discharge his duty; but the point I make is if the appropriations heretofore made were recklessly managed and wasted, now that we will have this appropriation properly expended we probably can get along without any great increase of the amount; that the reckless management of the appropriations heretofore made for the postal service is pretty conclusively proven by looking into the management of Colonel Burnside's account, who was the disbursing officer for the Post-Office Department, who is required to give bond. Allow me to say his bond has not been renewed since 1875. His first bond bears date February 2, 1875, for $40,000. His second and last bond for $40,000 bears date October, 1875. Two of the sureties upon these bonds have for years been dead and their estates wound up, and no new bond has ever been required. This disbursing officer's account has not been settled and balanced for years. Here is a list of the requisitions made by this officer to pay the employés of the Department. The following are the amounts drawn from the Treasury and the amounts of the pay-roll for each month commencing July 1, 1881:

The overdrafts did not stop here, but these amounts show how loosely the money heretofore appropriated has been handled, and if you will look into this disbursing officer's account you will find the same reckless management in all of his accounts. The account to pay rent was overdrawn; his accounts for carpets and furniture was overdrawn; the sales of waste paper were not accounted for. Now, all this has nothing to do with the question now under consideration, except that we see that if the appropriation was in excess of the amounts necessary to defray the expenditures of that Department, had the Postmaster-General done his duty and squared the accounts of this officer every month it would have been discovered that the appropriations were in excess of the amounts required. Now, as we see such neglect upon the part of the disbursing officer in one instance, it may be that neglect has crept into other branches of the service. And as I think the present Postmaster-General is going to do his duty I do not think that it is necessary to increase every appropriation unless we have clear proof that it is necessary.

Mr. HORR. What has that got to do with the question as to whether we shall have clerks in the railway mail service?

Mr. NEECE. It is not a question whether we shall have clerks in the railway mail service, but it is a question of the proper execution of the law. It is a question of what we should do after a proper examination of the subject. I believe the gentleman from Michigan to be honest; I believe we have an honest Postmaster-General to-day, a man who will look after the money that is intrusted to him. But the question is, has it been done in the past? The question is, whether we have not already given more money than is necessary for the service?

Mr. HORR. For the clerical service?

Mr. NEECE. Just let me give a few figures, and the gentleman can determine for himself. I have a statement here showing the payments by the disbursing clerk of the Post-Office and his requisitions on the Treasury. About July 1, 1881, he made a requisition on the Treasury for $60,000 to pay the employés of the Post-Office Department. The pay-rolls show a disbursement of only $46,578.46. In August, 1881, he made a requisition for $50,000. The pay-roll only amounted to $46,848.85. In September, 1881, he made a requisition for $50,000, and the pay-roll only amounted to forty-five thousand and some odd hundred dollars. In October of that year he made a requisition for $50,000 and the pay-roll was only $47,000. In November the requisition was for $50,000, and the pay-roll was only $46,000.

In December he made a requisition for $50,000, and the pay-roll was only $47,000. Now, the point I want to make is, that these appropriations that we have been making from year to year have been unnecessarily large, and if they had been proper and correct and a strict account had been required, there would have been a great deal of money saved. I charge then that you have appropriated more money for every department of the postal service than is necessary. I have a list here, a part of which I will publish, running down to 1883, in which in this one branch of the service alone, to which I have called attention, there have been overdrafts amounting to $15,582.90. The Postmaster-General, who ought to have looked after the money, neglected that part of his duty, and it never was seen to by anybody.

This officer never made a full settlement of his accounts. His accounts have not been settled once since 1875. It has continued in that line down to the present time, not only on the pay-rolls of the employés, but wherever he paid rent or other accounts his very drafts were more than the money required to meet them. Wherever he paid for coal or carpets, wherever the money was used for any other purpose, a large surplus was drawn from the Treasury and the remainder stuck to his hands, and those having the matter in charge never looked to it until the present Postmaster-General took the matter in hand and made the investigations.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman suppose that this amount had anything to do with reference to the employment or the payment of the railway postal employés?

Mr. NEECE. I propose to show that the money appropriated here and used under the same disbursing officer, that is the Postmaster-General, was not properly looked after.

Mr. HORR. How does that affect the fact that you must provide the necessary force of employés for the railway mail service? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. NEECE. It is the business of the Postmaster-General to see to it that the appropriations are properly disbursed and the accounts properly settled; but in this instance he failed to do it until recently.

Mr. HORR. But there is no money robbed by the postal clerks, is there?

Mr. NEECE. I have not any information upon that point.

Mr. HORR. Have you heard of any being robbed?

Mr. NEECE. Yes, sir; many instances.

Mr. HORR. By the postal clerks?

Mr. NEECE. Not by the postal clerks.

Mr. HORR. But did this clerk to whom you are now referring have anything to do with the postal clerks or the payment of the railway employés?

Mr. NEECE. I am not making any reckless statement, as the gentleman will see if he will listen. I am referring to the fact that the appropriations for a particular branch of the office which I have examined have not been properly applied.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman think that because some one clerk in a disbursing office stole some money that the whole service is therefore wrong, and that no money ought to be appropriated?

Mr. NEECE. No, sir; but if the superintendent of the Department has neglected the accounts of one clerk the probability is that he has neglected those of others.

Mr. HORR. Not necessarily.

Mr. NEECE. I believe if he had thoroughly investigated the workings of the Department he would have found that more money was appropriated than was necessary for an honest administration of the Department.

Mr. HORR. Will you permit me to say that position is not true unless you can count one man as having stolen all that the rest had appropriated to them?

Mr. NEECE. I am not saying a word about stealing. I say the disbursement of the money has not been properly looked after. For three years it has been neglected. And if in one office it has been neglected for three years the probability is that it has been neglected in others.

Mr. HORR. Look them up. If there are a number we want you to show us one of them.

Mr. NEECE. I am wanting you to assist us in doing that.

Mr. HORR. For my part I am quite willing to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Illinois [Mr. NEECE] would hardly find it necessary to inquire into the actual state of any of your bureaus to ascertain whether or no the public service was being honestly administered, if he considered the necessary and natural effect of a lavish appropriation of the public money. Let my friend from Illinois examine impartially any branch of the administration of your Government, any bureau of it, and he will find from the necessity of the case the natural and legitimate outgrowth of lavish and profligate appropriations of the public money. If the principle on which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] proposes to administer this Government should become the law of Congress, integrity in any Department of your Government would be the exception and not the rule. The history of this Government has established that beyond any possible question, and Congress can no more pretend not to know that dishonesty in the Government service is the outgrowth of its legislation, where it goes beyond the absolute needs of the public service, than it can pretend not to know the legitimate effect of any other measure of legislation.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] comes over to this side of the House and thinks it proper to lecture gentlemen here. He takes my friend from Illinois to task. He speaks to this side of the House as though his utterances were final and conclusive. Now, my friend should bear in mind that it is because of one of those extraordinary events which do not occur once in half a century, no matter what party is administering this Government or one of its great Departments, he has obtained control of one of the great appropriation bills. Why, sir, he should remember that that does not necessarily give him the right to dictate to gentlemen upon this floor. I admit it was an unexampled achievement. Go back over the whole period since that committee was organized and nothing like it has occurred before. I concede that.

But still I do not think it entitles the gentleman to put on airs and come over and dictate to gentlemen here what line of policy they should pursue. I conceive it was a bright achievement; but the gentleman from Michigan should bear in mind that he that putteth on his armor should not boast like him that putteth it off. He has not carried his scheme through yet. He has not had his measure ratified by the action of the majority of this House; and it may be possible, notwithstanding he obtained control of the Committee on Appropriations on that question, that that assumption of power, that leadership, may not be ratified when the vote shall be finally taken. So that my friend should not plume himself so valorously on results until the final consummation is reached.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word on the question now before the House. You appropriated by the original bill as it passed this House $4,000,000 for the clerks of the postal-car service. The Senate has increased that sum $300,000. Now I have said already to the House, and I trust I may be able to say it again in such a manner that at least the idea I want to convey shall reach gentlemen who have not examined the subject, that the number of persons employed by that amount of $4,000,000 depends entirely upon the action of your Postmaster-General. The salaries are not fixed except the maximum. There are different classes—not to exceed $800, not to exceed $1,000, not to exceed $1,200, and not to exceed $1,400. Inside of those limitations the Postmaster-General is invested with absolute power to employ just as many postal clerks as he pleases.

Mr. HORR. Now will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer a question; nothing more.

Mr. HORR. Under that regulation the Departments have made regulations whereby they have promoted and fixed the salaries of these men according to their service. That is true, is it not?

Mr. HOLMAN. Their salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. HORR. According to the time of service and the value of the men.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Department has fixed the compensation inside the limits I have named.

Mr. HORR. Do you not think they ought to do that?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly I do. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. HORR. Having fixed them, do you think they ought to cut them down?

Mr. HOLMAN. I say unhesitatingly the compensations are too high. That is the idea I am trying to convey all the time.

Mr. HORR. You think the Department ought to cut them all down?

Mr. HOLMAN. With $4,000,000, the largest sum ever appropriated by Congress for the Post-Office service, there is not a service connected with your employment of clerks in postal cars that can not be efficiently executed. And what I complain of is this: Gentlemen call attention to the fact—and the public press calls attention to the fact—every now and then it is discovered by mere accident—that corruption is rampant and rioting in some bureau of your Government. Gentlemen affect to be astonished at it; and what is strange, the public press affects to be astonished at it; Congress affects to be astonished at it. And yet there has never been an hour in your history that the fact has not been demonstrated that the appropriation of a dollar over the absolute requirements of the public service, frugally administered, was but the appropriation of a dollar for the corruption of your public service.

I grow impatient when I hear an expression of astonishment that corruption riots in any Department of your Government. How could it be otherwise, in view of the corrupting power of appropriations beyond the needs of the Government? In the public service of the Government, from its beginning down to the present hour, I do not care what party is in power, no matter what party is in power, the result is inevitable. There is no half-way ground in our Government between frugal expenditures and corrupt administration. If your Government is frugally administered, it will be honest; if your appropriations are lavish and beyond the needs of the Government, corruption will riot in your bureaus—in every department of your public service. From the hour your Government was established down to the present time that simple fact has been demonstrated.

Permit me to say that no committee of conference, no managers on the part of the House, can create any material delay over an item like this. This is but a question of how much money shall be appropriated. Of course the House understands that this item is not materially in the way of a recommendation to come to an agreement between the two Houses. If the conferees on the part of the Senate and those on the part of the House can not agree upon one sum, they can agree upon another. The conferees of the one body as well as of the other are amenable to reason. Of course on this point, standing by itself, there will be no delay in reaching an agreement by your conferees.

I wish to say this much for the purpose of showing that this item is not to be considered an important one; it is not at all in the way of your final action on the matter. The real trouble, the one upon which the chairman of your conferees desires to obtain an expression of opinion from the House, is as to a much more important measure—one not simply involving a question of dollars and cents, but involving the question whether or not Congress possesses sufficient power to control in any manner the great corporations which you have organized. It is an issue between your great corporations and your Government.

The fact has been brought to the attention of the House, and gentlemen have had occasion to examine the report made, that a commission was organized by law and was appointed by the Postmaster-General to inquire into a fact which was asserted eight years ago, that you were paying even then, and on a basis of the reduction of the current expenses of the railroads you have been paying ever since, over 20 per cent. more than was reasonable for the transportation of your mails by the railroads of the country. The reduction has been 15 per cent. only, while the rate of transportation was fixed on the 3d day of March, 1873, in the most extravagant period of the country and in a time of peace.

Gentlemen will remember the extraordinary bills which passed this House and became laws on the 3d day of March, 1873, and they will remember with what indignation that legislation was received by the people of this country, and how the majority of this House was promptly transferred from that side of the House to this side. Gentlemen are familiar with this history, and the measure which fixed the rate of railroad transportation higher than it was during the war period was a part of that general system of wild and reckless legislation.

The moment the party on this side of the House obtained the control of this branch of Congress an effort was made upon that measure as well as upon the others to compel a retracing of the steps in legislation which had been taken, but we only partially succeeded. It is now proposed to accomplish what was asserted to be necessary then, and what is sustained by infinitely stronger arguments now, a reduction of the cost of the transportation of mails by railroads to the extent of 20 per cent. A reduction to the extent of 15 per cent. has already been accomplished. This amendment embraces a reduction of 5 per cent. further, which will cover only about six or seven hundred thousand dollars. Yet the commission to which I have referred has reported to the Post-Office Department, and that report has come to you, that you can pay the railroads all that can be justly claimed for the transportation of your mails and reduce the amount now appropriated for that purpose by $1,000,000.

Mr. HORR. Right here let me ask the gentleman what proportion of that amount would be taken from the Union and Central Pacific Railroads, which are not included in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will have occasion to come down to details in a moment.

Mr. HORR. It would be about $600,000, would it not?

Mr. HOLMAN. I say the effect of the 5 per cent. reduction would be to reduce the expenditures between $600,000 and $700,000 on roads other than land-grant roads.

Mr. HORR. Yes; but the million dollars reduction to which the gentleman refers does not come out of the roads affected by this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The general statement of the railroad commission shows simply that the railroad system is now receiving too much. It is unhappily but one system. Some gentlemen do not seem to bear in mind, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] forgets, that the railroads in this country are not made up of separate and independent systems, but unfortunately your railroads are embraced in one great system; a few great railroad monopolists control your entire railroad system.

Mr. HORR. I think that is not so.

Mr. HOLMAN. And your Post-Office Department assures Congress that the railroad system of this country can well bear a reduction of $1,000,000 in what is paid to it for the transportation of the mails; and $600,000 or $700,000 of that amount would be the result of this 5 per cent. reduction.

Now that is all I shall have occasion to say in regard to the 5 per cent. reduction. There are gentlemen who certainly can not possibly lean against railroad corporations, who do not lean too much in behalf of your Government, who say that a 5 per cent. reduction on other than land-grant and bond roads will yield a saving of $600,000 or $700,000.

Then we come to apply the measure to the land-grant roads, to the roads which have received Government bonds, to the roads, in other words, which this Government has constructed and equipped and, as it were, presented almost bodily to an association of gentlemen who are now commanding and controlling the larger portion of the wealth of this country.

We propose that these roads shall transport the mails for 50 per cent. of the compensation allowed to corporations to which the Government has granted no subsidies.

As to the 5 per cent. reduction, gentlemen must see very readily that there is no ground for a compromise. This House must either say directly and squarely that it will stand by that 5 per cent. reduction, or it must back down squarely at the demand of gentlemen who believe that the railroads ought to be fostered and encouraged. As to the land-grant roads, it will be seen there are grounds for a fair and reasonable compromise. If 50 per cent. can not be agreed upon as a proper rate, some other amount can no doubt be adopted. If every one of the railroad corporations which have received public grants ought not to be compelled to bear the burden of transporting the mails at 50 per cent. of the amount paid to roads which have received no subsidies, then apply the principle to those corporations that have received grants large enough to make it absolutely certain that the principle can not operate with any injustice upon them.

Gentlemen will see that in all this controversy the main point is whether or not it is safe for Congress to act upon the recommendation of the Post-Office Department, or rather upon the recommendation of the post-office commission, and reduce the compensation for carrying the mails 5 per cent. as to the general railroad system of the country. I repeat, as to the other question, some compromise can undoubtedly be reached by further conference between the two Houses.

I hope, therefore, that this House will insist on its disagreement to all three of the amendments—the first embracing $300,000, the next $1,000,000, and the next, including the two propositions with reference to the pay for mail transportation, one for a reduction of 5 per cent. upon the general railroad system, the other that the land-grant roads shall receive 50 per cent. of the amount allowed for similar service to roads which have received no subsidies. I hope the House will insist on its disagreement with the Senate on this subject. If so, I have no doubt an agreement can be reached which will be entirely satisfactory to both branches of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, as has been stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the real point upon which the two Houses have failed to agree is the provision with regard to the compensation of railroads. As to the appropriation for railway mail clerks, I am inclined to think we could have reached an agreement on the other amendment if we could have reached an agreement on the provisions reducing the compensation to railroads.

The difference between the gentlemen from Michigan and myself is this: He has an opinion that Congress should yield the full amount of every estimate demanded by the Departments. He goes upon the theory that the officers of the Department are wiser than Congress; that the officials of this Department would not ask any more than what they need; and we should without investigation yield all that these estimates of the Department call for.

Mr. HORR. If you say that we should grant every just and proper estimate you state my position correctly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How shall we ascertain whether the estimate is just and proper unless we investigate the grounds upon which the estimate is made?

Mr. HORR. That is what I have done.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Committee on Appropriations say that they have investigated this question, and that the amount demanded by the Department for clerks in the railway mail service is more than the efficiency of that service requires. We have shown, as I have said, a willingness to increase this appropriation $175,000 beyond the appropriation of last year. But the Senate demand that we shall yield $325,000. They say, "You must yield every dollar the Department asks; we allow you no judgment on this matter; you shall be governed by our dictation." Indeed, the Senate has increased the appropriation for this service beyond the full amount recommended or asked by the Department.

The question of difference is only as to the amount. I insist from the investigation we have made that when we yield the amount which the House conferees have shown a willingness to yield, we furnish every dollar that will be needed (if the money be honestly expended) to provide clerical force for the railway mail service. Without discussing that question further, I leave it entirely to the House to determine.

Now, I come to what is really the essential point of difference between the two Houses. It is as to the compensation to railroads. Upon that question, as the gentleman from Indiana has said, we confront the railroad power. It is the railroads that stand behind the Senate. It is the railway corporations we are struggling with to-day. Now, the first question is, what is fair and just compensation for the railroads for carrying the mail? I maintain we ought to pay these companies every dollar that justice and fair dealing require. If this bill did not carry an amount which would compensate the railroad companies fairly for this service, I would not stand here contesting with the Senate upon this proposition.

But I think we have the evidence here which fair-minded men will accept, because it is official, which does fully and completely answer the argument of the gentleman the other day when he asserted that these provisions do not provide as fair compensation for carrying the mail as the railroads are receiving for carrying freight and express matter.

A word or two on that point and I will leave it with you. All men will admit, the most lucrative rate of compensation received by railroads is that for passenger traffic; the gentleman from Michigan admitted that the other day. Now, the commission appointed by the Post-Office Department to investigate this matter declared that the railroads are receiving 26 cents per car per mile for passenger travel, and that commission said, in reference to mail compensation to railroads, if 25 cents per car per mile is allowed, which is only 1 cent lower than the amount received for passenger travel, the rate would be fair and just to the roads and we would thereby save $1,000,000 annually on the cost of this service. Our bill makes that reduction of $1,000,000, and we give to the railroads in the aggregate the full sum which the report of the commission says they ought to have for this service.

This commission states when we allow that sum we are allowing the railroads nearly as much for carrying mails as is paid for passenger traffic.

Now, compare the accommodations furnished for the mail service and the accommodations furnished for passenger travel. On the mail cars there are no brakesmen, no conductors, no expense of that kind to be incurred. On the mail cars there are one or two postal mail clerks and an amount of dead weight of mail matter to be carried. The mail cars are carried on the same trains passengers are carried on. They will run those passenger trains anyway, whether mail cars are attached or not. Besides, Mr. Speaker, the pay for the mail service is always certain. There is freedom from the danger of liability for loss or injury to the mails as there is for damage in the case of carrying passengers, express, or freight. There is complete immunity from damage on that account.

Then, considering the cheapness of the accommodations furnished the mail-car service, the freedom from liability, and certainty of pay, taking all these things into consideration, I say the railroads can well afford to carry the mails for a smaller sum even than we allow in this bill and at a far less rate than they now receive for passenger traffic.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] said in his remarks this morning that he had been informed by a member from Mississippi that they were receiving less rate for carrying the mails in his district than was paid as freight for carrying lumber. That is not shown by the statistics of the Post-Office Department. They show that the rates per mile per ton for carrying freight are less than 1½ cents, and they also show there is paid for a mail service from about 7 to 35 cents per ton per mile. There is the report of your officials of the Post-Office Department certifying in no instance do we pay less than about 7 cents per ton per mile for carrying the mails, and it goes further and shows that in no instance can it be found to cost more than 1½ cents for carrying freight throughout the country.

Mr. HORR. Now, is that fair?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, it is fair.

Mr. HORR. Why is it fair?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why, it is fair because it is true. These Government officials have so reported after investigation. It is said in answer to the statement of the gentleman in his speech this morning that in Mississippi more is paid for carrying lumber than is paid for carrying the mails.

Mr. HORR. Is it fair to charge for one-third of a car——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not time to go into that now.

Mr. HORR. You should answer, for that is the whole of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I really have not time to yield. Now, the compensation of the mail service is growing immensely every year. It has already reached a figure larger than the whole annual income under the administration of John Q. Adams. The railroad mail service costs the Government nearly $19,000,000 a year. It is growing amazingly. I have a table here, which I should like to read if I had time, showing that it is increasing at the rate of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. It has reached, as I have said, nearly $19,000,000 and the time will soon come, unless some check is put on the compensation paid railroads, when it will reach twice the amount of the present pay.

Now, sir, when we remember that the railways have reduced the cost of carrying freights, express matter, and passengers they ought to stand a reduction upon the compensation for carrying the mails. The expenses of the railroads themselves have decreased enormously in the last few years. The statistics all show that. The cost of the service to them is far less than it was a few years ago when the rate of compensation for carrying the mails was fixed. The wages of the employés have decreased. The cost of steel rails is less, and iron and all other materials that enter into the construction of their roads and their working have decreased. I therefore feel that we ought in justice to the people demand a reduction upon the compensation for carrying the mails.

I now yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who wishes to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Only a word or two in reference to this matter, and I shall detain the House but a very few moments. We are approaching the end of the session and an adjournment is anxiously looked for by both sides of the House. I observed in the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana that he intimated there might be no disagreement upon the question of the postal clerks. I am glad to hear that. That means, of course, $4,300,000 for this branch of the service. I believe that appropriation should be made, because we made an appropriation the other day for letter-carriers of $4,000,000 by a decided majority. That appropriation furnishes about one hundred and forty cities, providing the means for delivering the letters to the citizens four or five times a day in each of these cities.

Now, this appropriation distributes the mails on 120,000 miles of railroad throughout all parts of the country. The service is already upon many of these roads, and needs to be extended to others. I refer specially to the roads that do a pouch service. They convey the mails to the people living along in the section they traverse once, sometimes twice, in a day; whereas in the city where they have free delivery and four or five deliveries a day it costs $4,000,000. If this extra $300,000 is given we can give mail facilities along the lines of these roads to the great body of the people who are anxious for it.

I do not believe the salary of the people performing this service on the railroads is adequate. Their duties are very onerous. They are away from their homes most of the time, and have to pay their own expenses. The most of them get only from $800 to $1,000 a year, and in my judgment they are the most poorly paid employés in the postal service.

Now, as to the matter of the compensation of the railways themselves, and I ask the attention of the House upon this point. It may be, and I am inclined to think it is, true that the railroads are getting more compensation in the aggregate than they ought to have for carrying the mails. But gentlemen must recollect that this legislation under which that service is performed has been on our statute-books since 1873. In 1876 they took 10 per cent. from that compensation through the efforts of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and this was done during the time when everything was cheap. Two years later, under the lead of my friend from Georgia, they took 5 per cent. more off during the hard times. Now times are not so hard, money is more easy, prices are higher, and yet now you propose to take 5 per cent. more off. There was more reason for taking 10 per cent. off in 1876 than there is for taking off 5 per cent. now. But my friend from Indiana has got used to this kind of thing, and is not happy unless he is doing it all the time. [Laughter.]

One word more. There is this principle, and I will not say anything more about the matter than this—there is this principle that operates between the House and the Senate when they have conferences on bills. Appropriations are made according to existing law, and if either the House or the Senate proposes to change the law upon an appropriation bill and the co-ordinate branch does not agree to that change, then the body that proposes that change under the existing law must back down. That is the practice in dealing with these matters. Now what is the question here? The House proposes to change the law in this respect. It proposes to cut down the compensation of the railroads, being a question of legislation upon an appropriation bill. The Senate comes and says "no." It says unanimously, Republicans and Democrats uniting, that it will not agree to this change. It says we will join you in appropriating for the service as it is, but we will not legislate upon this bill.

Now, I put it to gentlemen on both sides of the House, when you get to that point of a deadlock is it not the unvarying practice that the party that proposes legislation on an appropriation bill has to give way? I would not have said this were it not that we all want to get away from here. You Democrats want to get away to this funeral to come off at Chicago. We Republicans want to go home to our wives and children. With these facts staring us in the face I do not think there is any propriety in the House standing out longer upon these points. The most sensible thing the House can do is to recede and let the bill go to the President for his signature before sundown this evening.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the previous question on the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference and discharging the committee.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 11, and 17, and upon that motion call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman demands the previous question and it is ordered it will prevent any motion to agree with an amendment. If the gentleman desires that the sense of the House shall be tested on those propositions it may be better not to demand the previous question.

Mr. HORR. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the two amendments of the Senate numbered 10 and 11 and agree with the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to understand the status of my motion, which is that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet stated the gentleman's motion. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10 and 11 and agree to the same.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does that take precedence of my motion?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope my motion will be considered as pending.

Mr. HORR. I desire to state that my motion does not include the amendment relating to the appropriation for railway post-office clerks.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the previous question will be considered as ordered; and the first question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 10 and 11 and agree to the same.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Amendments 10 and 11 include the appropriation of an additional million of dollars for transportation on railroad routes and the striking out of the House provision in reference to the rate of compensation to railroads.

Mr. HORR. They include all the questions which pertain to the railroad service.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

Amendment numbered 10 of the Senate was read, as follows:

On page 4, line 65, strike out "$11,700,000" and insert "$12,750,000;" so that it will read:

"For transportation on railroad routes, $12,750,000."

Amendment numbered 11 of the Senate was read, as follows:

On pages 4, 5, and 6 strike out the following:

"(11) The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, for transportation of mails on railroad routes, by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent. per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails, on the basis of the average weight, fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1878: Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, or whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by subsidies in bonds and lands granted and issued by the United States under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and act amendatory thereof, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to be paid to the other railroad companies for corresponding postal service; and the above-entitled act approved July 1, 1862, and the sixth section thereof, and the act amendatory of said act, approved July 2, 1864, are hereby amended to conform to the foregoing provision fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to railroad companies whose railroads were so constructed, in whole or in part, by subsidies in bonds and lands, under the provisions of said acts, for the transportion of the mails, and said acts and each of them shall be held to be altered and amended accordingly; and the foregoing provisions, and each of them, shall be subject to amendment as in the opinion of Congress shall be just and required by the public welfare; but no right now existing in favor of the United States in relation to said railroads, or either of them, or in relation to said grants, or either of them, shall be deemed impaired or waived by this act or any provision thereof."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would it be in order to call for a division of the question so as to have separate votes on the 5 per cent. reduction and the reduction of the compensation to land-grant and bonded railroads?

The SPEAKER. There are two amendments of the Senate included in the motion of the gentleman from Michigan. The gentleman has a right to a separate vote on each.

Mr. HORR. That is not the point made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The provision proposed to be stricken out by the eleventh amendment of the Senate embraces two parts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think a Senate amendment can be divided. Does the gentleman desire separate votes on the two amendments?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The two amendments relate to the same subject, the compensation to railroads. I do not call for separate votes on the two amendments.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been demanded on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HORR. I find there is some uncertainty as to what we are to vote upon. I wish to say that this question does not affect the clerk service at all. It is the question simply of the compensation to railroads.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 103, not voting 105; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. HORR was agreed to, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. RYAN and Mr. TILLMAN asked unanimous consent that the reading of the names of those voting be dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.

The names were then read.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. NUTTING, on all political questions, until July 8.

Mr. HARDEMAN with Mr. ARNOT, on this vote.

Mr. JOHNSON with Mr. GARRISON, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. DUNHAM with Mr. LAMB, on this vote.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. PUSEY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. CONNOLLY with Mr. VALENTINE, on all political questions, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. BISBEE with Mr. WILLIAMS, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. HANBACK, on all political questions, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. PAYSON, for this day.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. HOUK, on all political questions, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. LAMB. I desire to state that I am paired with Mr. DUNHAM. If he were present, I would vote "no" and he would vote "ay" on this proposition.

Mr. HARDEMAN (having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired on this question with Mr. ARNOT, of New York. If here, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. HORR moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HORR. I now move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 17, and agree to the same. And I trust that we will not need a yea-and-nay vote to decide it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on that.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 45 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the amendment had better be read.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment numbered 17, as follows:

Page 5, line 8, after the word "million," insert "three hundred thousand;" so that it will read:

"For railway post-office clerks, $4,300,000."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 101, not voting 100; as follows:

YEAS—123.

So the motion of Mr. HORR was agreed to, and the Senate amendment was concurred in.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. DUNHAM with Mr. LAMB, on this vote. If present, Mr. DUNHAM would vote "ay" and Mr. LAMB would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to reports of committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

A bill (S. 838) to consolidate the bureau of military justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposition of abandoned and useless military reservations; and,

A bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul in the State of Minnesota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title;

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Stedman.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion;

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers in either the States of Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska; and

A bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the rules and articles of war.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. 183) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William Hull.

The message also announced that the Senate requested the House to return the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick.

SOUTHERN KANSAS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. RYAN. I desire to call up from the Speaker's table the request of the Senate for a conference on House bill 4680 to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the message from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 30, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate asks a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, and the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Ordered, That Mr. INGALLS, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COKE be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RYAN. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference requested.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. WELLBORN, Mr. PIERCE, and Mr. PERKINS as the conferees on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. DUNN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 114, noes 8.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MOULTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HOBLITZELL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of N. H. Plunkett.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREY AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order which the Clerk will read will be agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk request the Senate to return to the House the bill of the House (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the entry of this order? The Chair hears none; and the order is adopted.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the unfinished business—the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman desire to limit debate? [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"]

Mr. ELLIS. I have understood—not from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] himself—that he and one or two other gentlemen desire to speak against the bill reported by the majority.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to waive my right to occupy an hour if we can finish the debate to-night.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on the fortification appropriation bill be closed in an hour and a half.

Mr. ANDERSON. Say one hour.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope the House will vote down this motion. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations desires to be heard; so do I.

Mr. HERBERT. Say two hours.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] so as to limit debate to one hour.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the previous question.

Mr. ELLIS. I want only two hours more of general debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the motion to allow one hour be adopted, will the time be equally divided?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for understanding between members on the floor. Under the rules the gentleman first obtaining the floor would be entitled to an hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe I have the floor; but I will not take advantage of the rule giving me an hour, if the House should limit debate to an hour and a half.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. COBB to limit debate to one hour was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, as amended was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. ELLIS, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. BLOUNT in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. On this bill general debate has been limited by order of the House to one hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, no subject of greater practical moment than the one under consideration has come before this Congress. Yet it has been withheld—for what cause I know not—until the closing hours of the session.

Mr. ELLIS. I can state. The bill has been ready for report six weeks.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. However long it may have been ready, the fact is it comes here in the closing hours of the session.

I sympathize fully with those gentlemen who would put this country in a condition of defense. I sympathize more largely with those gentlemen who think that this country needs but little defense other than its moral force, and the fact that it has no entangling alliances; that it has no quarrels and seeks no quarrels with the rest of the world; that we are a nation of freemen engaged in developing a continent; that for a hundred years to come the energies of this people will be wanted for peace and not for war.

Yet there are times in the history of nations when war becomes inevitable. I sympathize with my colleague [Mr. DORSHEIMER] in the view he took yesterday as to the exposed condition of the ports of this country in case we should be thrown into conflict with any of the great powers of the world. We would indeed be at their mercy; and great indeed would be the humiliation if to have saved a few thousand or a few hundred thousand dollars expended at the right moment we were put under such tribute as France was placed under at the close of the Franco-German war. It is wise, therefore, to make provision for the future, but it is wiser to see that provision is made prudently, judiciously, and effectively.

It has been said, sir, we need earthworks; that we need guns; that we need torpedoes. Earthworks are the one phase of this question which need give us no concern here. They can be extemporized, as they often have been when necessary, sufficient for the protection of any harbor. But guns are quite a different affair. For them time is wanted.

When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was good enough to yield me the floor I held in my hand and was looking over the report of the gun foundery board (Executive Document 97) sent to the House, in which this whole question is discussed. On reading that report two things become apparent. The first is that if this money were appropriated there is not knowledge enough in this country or in its officers to expend it. It could not be wisely expended. The very conclusion of this report is that the question is not solved but is being solved as to whether steel forged under heavy hammers or whether liquid steel compressed in a compressor is the better material for guns. Expend the money, which the majority propose to appropriate during the coming year, and so far as human judgment can go it would be expended for a hammer; and yet, so far as the judgment of this gun foundery board is concerned, it ought to be expended for a compressor. And if expended for a hammer and the compressor is the thing that is wanted, the money spent for a hammer is literally thrown away.

A year ago if I had been asked on this floor what was the first step to put the country in a condition of defense, I would have said it was a steam-hammer that would cost a million of dollars. And I did say it in the course of the debate on the naval bill. And now, with the light which is derived from this report made by the most intelligent and able officers we have in this country, I may add I crossed the Atlantic with them last year, and took such part as I could in aiding them in the way of getting the information they desired——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes longer.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I followed it up as far as possible by visits to the great arsenals abroad, and I found that the most intelligent foreign officers were as much at sea as it was possible for men to be as to the methods of manufacture to be adopted in order to provide proper weapons of defense. The question is not one of material, but as to the proper mode of using it in the construction of the weapons.

There are three kinds of guns, in the construction of which the authorities differ; and these are the gun made of forged steel, the gun made of liquid steel compressed, and the wire gun. The probability is that the wire gun is the gun which is going to supersede the other two. It will require one year to complete the tests which are now being made, and made here in this country as well as abroad, of the wire gun before it can be definitely settled whether that gun is to be the gun of the future.

Now, the majority come in here and they report in favor of a large immediate expenditure. I admit their patriotism. I admit the fact that they are governed only by the best and wisest views of what our policy should be, yet I see its report is not based upon knowledge. The committee on the whole subject I think is at sea literally. When I heard yesterday the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] talking about spending some hundreds of thousands of dollars a year for Gatling guns, I recalled the fact on that great steamer of war, the Alexandria, as I was talking with the captain on the deck, coming to the front of the vessel he showed me the Nordenfeldt gun, and he said, "You make a great mistake in building Gatling guns; this is a far better weapon. We had them at Alexandria, and the experience there demonstrated the fact that one Nordenfeldt gun was worth two Gatling guns." And yet, as I understood the speech of the gentleman on yesterday, he proposed to spend a part of this money for the purchase of Gatling guns. It shows how perfectly absurd it is for gentlemen here to undertake to direct the expenditure of this vast amount of money.

Mr. ELLIS. Does not the gentleman from New York know that these guns are entirely different, and for different purposes?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Nordenfeldt and Gatling guns are applicable to the same purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I saw them with my own eyes on the same ship on which they had been employed in the bombardment of Alexandria.

The gentleman may refer to some Gatling gun with which I am not familiar. But I repeat, I saw these guns on the ship that bombarded Alexandria, and was told by the able and efficient officers that the Gatling gun had been found to be inferior. I merely take the case put by the gentleman from Michigan.

Now, I am not opposed and never shall be opposed to providing adequate defenses for this country against its possible enemies, though I trust we shall never have to use these weapons of defense. But all the money that we have refrained from spending up to this time has been money saved to this Government. If we had spent in the last ten years any money for such purposes it would have been absolutely thrown away; and that part even of the minority bill which proposes to convert the old cast-iron guns is a mistake.

Every dollar spent upon the conversion of these guns is money thrown away. What we want to do is to hold our own as we stand to-day for another year, and then, after that year, I believe, from what I have seen in progress and what I know in regard to discoveries of new and better forms of material, that we shall be able to make an intelligent expenditure of the public money at the expiration of that time; and therefore, as between the two bills submitted, I prefer the minority bill. I shall therefore vote for the substitute at this time, and hereafter, when experiments now in progress have taught us how to spend the money effectively, I shall be glad to vote for such liberal appropriations as the best interests of the country, and, as I believe, the voice of the people, will require.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, the question involved in the discussion now before the Committee of the Whole is one of vast importance to the people of this country. The main question is what kind of defenses are necessary to secure our country from insult, menace, and invasion from other nations? I propose to notice in the brief period of ten minutes three modes of defense that are open to us. There are numerous defenses that can be cited, but I propose to notice, as I have said, but three which I think are of paramount importance and all sufficient for the needs of our people.

The first is the great and highest defense of our country, the surest defense it could have in time of war; it is that defense which has been found effective in all the ages of the world; a defense which we will have for all time to come; and that is in the heart and the mind and in the strong muscles of the people of this great country. With a strong heart and powerful mind and frame to defend our nation, our country needs to fear no nation on the face of the earth. Call upon our citizens, for we want no standing army. Standing armies have always been dangerous and menacing and insulting to the republican system of government. I say we need no standing army. We need the citizen soldier with a strong arm to form a nucleus around which to rally to keep away danger and peril if any nation should see fit to invade us. We want the men here who are the soul of a great liberty-loving people—our own citizens.

We want the people who have rallied upon every occasion when the emergency has arisen and offered their lives, their fortunes, and every thing they possessed in defense of this country. They will not be found wanting in the day of peril. We have the grandest country in existence—great in morals, great in intelligence, great in its power and in the devoted love of liberty; and that is a sufficient defense against all the nations of the earth. I will not enlarge more upon this idea; time will not permit me; but with the heart and the soul of the American people, liberty-loving as they are, there is no power on earth that can alarm or make them afraid. It is the best defense that we can have.

Now, there is another defense that comes next in consequence, and it is in my humble judgment the highest defense the American people have, and that is the character of the people of the United States. The history of the United States, in all of our struggles and complications and wars at home and abroad, is so well established, so well known, that I am satisfied no nation will ever be tempted to invade us. Not many nations will be tempted to insult us, for we will avenge that insult, we will defend ourselves.

We are not an aggressive nation. We are a nation that loves justice and peace and honor. We do not propose to conquer or subjugate the world. But with the great heart of the American people united, as it now is North and South and East and West, with millions of citizens ready to spring to the conflict whenever it shall be invited, the other nations of the world knowing this and knowing our history, will be slow to insult or to invade us.

Reference has been made in the course of this discussion to insults from abroad. It is no fault of yours if we have been insulted. It is the fault of a weak and puny administration that has not been ready to assert the rights of the American people on every occasion. There is where the fault lies. There never was a time and never will be a time when the great people of the United States of America will not vindicate their officers in protecting the humblest citizen of the United States anywhere and everywhere. You talk about an invasion. What power is likely to invade us, knowing our disposition to maintain our rights in a peaceable, quiet way if we can and if not to maintain them with the blood of the nation, to maintain them with every dollar in the Treasury?

Mr. RANDALL. On all sides it is conceded that this is a new departure, and we are urged to make it immediately. I maintain that there is no immediate necessity and that there is no prospective necessity for the armament ultimately intended by this first step as recommended to be taken by the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. The bill in fact involves an expenditure of $7,000,000. And if it is to be taken as indicative in any degree of compliance with past recommendations and purposes of the Ordnance Department, it ultimately means an expenditure of more than one hundred millions. I remember that just after the close of the war, with twenty-two millions of money left to the credit of the Ordnance Bureau, the Congress of the United States stood here and were informed that that amount of money was to be expended. The then Secretary of War, I think Mr. Stanton, stepped in and prevented it. And at a later period Congress came to the protection of the money of the Government and covered into the Treasury in 1870 the amount of money then to the credit of the Ordnance Department. But within a few days between the consideration of that bill and its becoming law the department really did expend in one way or another more than three millions of money, after in fact the opinion of both branches of the Congress was known.

Now, we are invited again to make such an appropriation. Is there any estimate? Why, sir, the estimates of the Departments of Ordnance and Engineers for fortifications and armament embraced originally as they went to the Secretary of War $4,250,000, or thereabout. The Secretary of War cut down that recommendation, and we find here in the estimates from the Secretary only one million recommended to be appropriated. And yet in the face of that we are invited to involve the Government for this year in an expenditure of $3,000,000 for these purposes, and subsequently in an expenditure of $1,000,000 a year more for the steel rifled guns.

I deny the right of this committee to make an appropriation in that way. I say that it is new legislation; that it is changing existing law and changing the policy of the Government, when Congress enacted that after two years these balances should be covered into the Treasury. And I say more on the subject of fortifications; I say that there is not any gun now agreed upon that will fit the casemates of the fort, and that there are no casemates of the fortifications to which the guns that are proposed to be constructed under this bill will be adapted. In this connection I ask leave to have read the first part of the views of the minority on that particular subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

[To accompany bill H. R. 7440.]

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Appropriations, consider that $175,000 is enough to expend in one year for the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications, if it be not too much, in contemplation of the possibility from the rapid changes in the character of armament that the forts may soon have to be rebuilt altogether. We think it would be a useless waste of public money to enter upon the construction of or alteration of fortifications in advance of the determination of the exact character of the armament to be provided for them. Our present forts have casemates of dimensions fitting them for the reception of 10-inch Rodman smooth-bores, which the Chief of Ordnance has said are of no earthly use against ironclads, and he has also said that no larger guns than these can find room in the casemates.

All the conditions of dimensions of the guns and the carriages on which they are to be mounted must be known to the engineer before he can make the design, even on paper, of the foundation of a single casemate, and the Chief of Engineers has informed us in his last report that we have no guns of the required kind, nor has any type for such guns yet been adopted by the United States. Common prudence and sagacity demand of us the determination as to the general character and dimensions of the guns to be accepted before we enter upon the almost useless building of forts and fortifications, which are likely to prove unsuitable for the necessities of war, if such a calamity shall come upon us. Of course this is independent of the waste of public money to which we are invited by the bill reported by a bare majority of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, in relation to what are known as movable torpedoes the minority recommend an appropriation of $50,000, which I presume would construct or experiment in the construction of one, including the motor. The motor to these torpedoes is the difficult problem as I understand it; and for the purpose of experimenting so as to find a proper motor we have added $25,000.

As to stationary torpedoes we have not given a very large sum of money, for the reason given in this report that there is a constant change and improvement of guns from year to year, and I may say from month to month. If we invest largely in these planted torpedoes we should find ourselves with a stock on hand, if not worthless, at least inferior in destructiveness to what will no doubt by further experiment prove more efficient.

But the policy of the report of the minority of the committee commends itself, in my judgment, to the mind of this House in this: That it throws open to the skill and the genius of the American mechanic the whole field, provided that these gentlemen who are engaged in this character of manufacture shall in the first instance make their own tests; but if they shall succeed in a test of one gun of any particular caliber or of any material, that then the United States will consider the propriety of purchasing a large number of those guns

Now, in reference to the material to be used in the manufacture of guns of the heavy kind, that is an open question; it has not been determined. The great difficulty, as I comprehend it from little reading, I confess, but a good deal of thought and listening to a great many who are well versed in this subject, the great difficulty in the manufacture of a gun to prevent its bursting is as to the material, the object being to reach a metal which will warm and chill with some degree of equality throughout.

It is a very remarkable fact that there have been perhaps as many lives lost by the bursting of guns in battle as there have been lives lost or persons wounded by the projectiles thrown by the enemy. It is a recorded fact that at Fort Fisher there were more people destroyed by the bursting of guns than by the projectiles thrown by the enemy.

I had hoped that we should have an opportunity to have completed the reading of the minority report, but as the House has restricted the time for general debate I must submit.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that in compliance with the request of the House the Senate returned the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertnor Jeffrey and others.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATON BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. I believe that under the rules of the House, the debate having come over to a day different from that on which it began, I am entitled to one hour to close the debate upon this bill, being now in charge of it? What I desire to ask is that I may be permitted to take that hour now.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Chair to rule upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule governing the matter is as follows:

The member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close where general debate has been had thereon; and if it shall extend beyond one day he shall be entitled to one hour to close, notwithstanding he may have used an hour in opening.

The gentleman having charge of the bill would be entitled to an additional hour under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. And, as I understand, he begins the hour now.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask consent of the House that I may take the hour in Committee of the Whole instead of in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. And the gentleman will not have an hour again in the House, after the previous question has been called.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly not.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] is entitled to the floor for an hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Gentlemen about me are asking whether the gentleman now in charge of the bill [Mr. ELLIS], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] being absent, proposes to have a vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not think the House can possibly vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, yes; we can vote on it to-night.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have the vote right now.

Mr. ELLIS. Very well; if it is the desire of the House we will have a vote to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] is entitled to an hour to close general debate on this bill.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask the attention of members of this Committee of the Whole, and their calm deliberate consideration, while I attempt to correct more errors of statement than I have ever before in all my experience here heard uttered in the course of one debate. Why, sir, I was astonished, and the astonishment grew on me, when I heard the distinguished gentleman, for whose intelligence and purity of character I have the highest respect and admiration, with the report in his hand make the statements which he did. In the brief time allowed me I can not follow and correct all the errors of statement which have been made in this discussion; but before I conclude I will endeavor to show that men have spoken on this question here who are utterly and absolutely ignorant of it.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not quite understood, Mr. Chairman, whether we will have a vote on this bill to-night or not. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] said he thought it was impossible to do so, and some members have gone or are about going away. I would like to have a distinct understanding whether we are to have a vote to-night.

Mr. ELLIS. I am willing to have a vote to-night, if gentlemen desire it.

Many MEMBERS. Vote to-morrow!

Mr. RANDALL. There is some disposition to have the vote taken in the morning; I have no feeling about it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Allow me to inquire how much longer the general debate is to run?

Mr. RANDALL. There is one hour more of general debate, under the control of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And then we enter upon the five-minute debate?

Mr. RANDALL. We do.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If that is the case, it is useless to talk about taking a vote on this bill to-night; it can not be done.

Mr. RANDALL. General debate can be closed to-night.

Mr. ELLIS. If no vote is to be taken on the bill to-night, I shall insist upon making my speech to-morrow, for I want members of the House to hear me. I therefore move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 48, noes 69.

Mr. ELLIS. I give the House notice that I shall demand a vote to-night.

Several MEMBERS. All right.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, it is but the reiteration of a mournful truth that has been often told to say that our coast and seaport cities are utterly and absolutely defenseless. Everybody in this country and elsewhere knows the fact—even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] concedes it.

Mr. RANDALL. There is only one thing more defenseless, and that is the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ELLIS. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the Treasury is assuredly in no danger, except it might be the danger of bursting, while the policy insisted upon by the gentleman [Mr. RANDALL] prevails. He insists that taxation shall not be reduced, that the surplus shall not be diminished at one end, and at the other that nothing shall be expended. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I will discuss that subject when it is before the House.

Mr. ELLIS. You had full and free opportunity some time ago to meet the question of tax reduction and you declined——

Mr. RANDALL. And I discussed it then.

Mr. ELLIS. And you voted that you would not even consider the question. But, Mr. Chairman, when I declare our common country to be in a defenseless condition it is not my unsupported utterance. It is the solemn and official declaration made to you again and again from your honest and purest soldiers, your tried and true officers charged with the operations and work necessary to the defense of the country. Can you for a moment question the intelligence, the patriotism, the purity of purpose of that great soldier and good man, who recently filled the high place of Chief of Engineers. Hear for a moment his official declaration. I read from the last annual report of Maj. Gen. H. G. Wright:

With old casemated works (than which there were none better in their day) designed long before the introduction of the 800 to 2,000 pounder rifled guns into modern warfare; their walls pierced for guns long since out of date; without iron armor or shields, and but partially armed even with the old ordnance; with old earthworks, some of them built in the last century; with new ones for modern guns and mortars but partially built and rapidly being destroyed by the elements by reason of their incompletion; with gun-batteries without guns, and mortar-batteries without mortars; with no carriages whatever for barbette guns of large size, except such as require the cannoniers to load from the tops of parapets, from which they can be picked off in detail by the enemy's sharpshooters; with an excellent defensive torpedo system developed at our torpedo school at Willet's Point, but only partially carried into effect; with but a very small number of our works prepared with the torpedo casemates and galleries necessary for securing the electrical apparatus from the enemy's fire, and for conducting the electric wires to the torpedo lines which must be laid when the day of trial comes; and with less than two hundred engineer soldiers educated for torpedo and other engineer service instead of the seven hundred and fifty-two men now authorized by law, and of whom not less than five hundred and twenty ought to be ready to supply the detachments required for torpedo service in our fortified harbors, we can make but a feeble defense against the powerful fleets now prepared and rapidly increasing, which will sooner or later be brought against us by some of the most powerful maritime nations on the earth, or by others nearer at hand, whose offensive naval means exceed our own, and whose powers are not to be despised.

During the year operations have been restricted to those necessary for the preservation and repair of existing works. No appropriations for new works, nor for the modification of existing ones, have been made during the past eight years, and to-day the permanent fortifications of the country are in the incomplete condition in which they were left when operations were suspended in 1876, and are rapidly deteriorating for lack of funds to complete them.

Do you want corroborative proof of this sad and shameful and dangerous condition of affairs? Listen then to the testimony of General Q. A. Gillmore, whose reputation as a military engineer, sustained alike in war and peace, is hardly second to that of any living soldier. He says:

The published records of our War Department for the last dozen years show with great force and clearness that we not only possess no guns capable of making a good defense against a modern fleet, but that if we did have the guns we have no places in readiness to receive them where they could be effectively used against armored vessels firing small missiles and case-shot at suitable ranges.

In other words, before we can hope to repel the attacks of war vessels of recent type, not only will the artillery for our forts have to be procured, but the forts themselves will need to be built, or the existing forts greatly modified.

This statement is so entirely true with respect to the most valuable of our positions on the seaboard that they may very properly be regarded as wholly destitute of protection, that which has been provided for them by the stringent economies of Congress being of little, if any, account.

Referring to the accessibility of our harbors to the iron-clad ships of European navies, General Gillmore says:

There are more than a dozen fine harbors on our Atlantic coast—Portland, Portsmouth, Boston, Newport, and Hampton Roads being among the number—that are easily accessible to the largest war vessels hitherto constructed or contemplated. There are more than half a dozen other harbors—among which may be specified New Bedford, New London, New York, and Key West—into which a few of the deepest men-of-war can not enter. But there is not one of them that does not possess ample depth to pass half the armored cruisers of Great Britain, including vessels armed with the 38-ton and 81-ton guns; all the German armored vessels except one; more than two-thirds of those of the Italian navy; all belonging to the Russian navy except two; all belonging to the Austrian navy except three; all belonging to Holland and Turkey without exception; and a large proportion of those belonging to the French and Spanish navies.

The aggregate population clustered about these twenty harbors for armored vessels is nearly 3,000,000, while the value of public and private property within easy and destructive range of a hostile fleet can not be far short of $2,000,000,000. The losses that might be inflicted in a few hours, in their present unprotected condition, would exceed more than tenfold the entire cost of suitable permanent defenses for the whole country. * * * It appears, therefore, that our entire Atlantic and Gulf seacoast, from Maine to Texas, is peculiarly at the mercy of a hostile naval power, and that our largest centers of population, commerce, and manufactures, where the greatest values are accumulated, and hence where the greatest temptations are offered and the greatest injury could be inflicted in the briefest interval of time, are within easy reach of the most destructive engines of war born of modern invention and science. The condition of the Pacific coast is equally defenseless.

Need I add another word or cite another authority to show that all of our 15,000 miles of seacoast, with its thirty cities, its 8,000,000 of people, and its wealth amounting to one-quarter of the entire wealth of the Union, is at the mercy not alone of first-class powers like Great Britain, France, Germany, but even of smaller nations and petty states like Chili and Japan, Mexico or Brazil—of any power, in fact, that can boast a war vessel of twelve inches of armor, bearing rifle guns of twelve inches caliber? This, sir, is a condition of affairs both disgraceful and dangerous. It is well calculated to excite the gravest apprehensions on the part of those whom we represent, and to arouse us to such a line of action, immediate and effective, as shall render our people who dwell by the sea safe and secure in their homes, no matter how the breast of that may be tortured and vexed by the keels of hostile armadas. This is the mandate of the Constitution of our country, and this is the example that the fathers of the Republic and their immediate successors taught us from 1797 to 1860, when we were the best fortified nation on the face of the earth.

But those who oppose defensive measures without a single exception say, "There will be no war." Who are these Wiggins's that thus prophesy? "Have they entered the councils of kings?" Are they able to forecast the future? Can they, as Maury to the physical deep, go to the shores of the political ocean and tell of its tides and winds, of its slumbering wrath, and when it shall be aroused? No man can predict the future or what it may bring forth; but we do know the past, and that in the century of our national life we have had five foreign wars, or one war to every twenty years of that life. Has human nature changed so suddenly? Are kings less ambitious? Have nations less of thirst for power or less of commercial greed than formerly? I pray for peace and that never again the Sabbath of our skies shall be jarred with the conflict of armed men; but looking abroad I see no spears being fashioned into pruning-hooks, no swords being beaten into plowshares. No; rather while I speak the tremendous thud of Krupp's hundred-ton hammer, and the hiss and growl of Whitworth's hydraulic compress, and the sturdy arms of 160,000 strong men are forging steel and fashioning it into guns of fabulous size and power and placing them on board of ships whose iron walls are almost invulnerable.

France defies the Monroe doctrine right in our own waters; England wants to possess and control the coming water way across the isthmus; $60,000,000 of American capital in Mexico may demand protection any day; Ireland may soon be once again upon the dissecting board of English policy, and Irish-American citizens who vote and send representatives here and sway parties still love the land of their birth and would bend our policy toward remonstrance if not interference; Spain's feeble grasp upon her West India possessions and her intense jealousy of our power and influence may embroil us with her at any moment; say what we will destiny marches on, and this Government, the representative of free thought and free speech, can not sulk in her tent while those ideas are in conflict, nor can we avoid that destiny which is to dominate the thought and the civilization and the commerce of this Western World. Are we not liable then to war? Every nation is. The history of nations is written rather with the sword than with the pen. And if so shall we not be prepared for defense? I would never advocate a policy that looked to aggression, but every dictate of prudence and every voice of reason bids us prepare for defense that we may be equal to any emergency that may arise from the mists of the future.

But, sir, not only does the prophet from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] say we will never have war, but he goes on to base his prophecy on facts. He takes the broad ground that nations can not go to war with us because of our cotton and breadstuffs. The gentleman knows or ought to know that England is already finding a bread market elsewhere, and that the farmers who send him here are now suffering from the lowest prices that wheat has commanded for years, because Russia, South America, India, and Servia are supplying the bread demand. And as for cotton, during our civil war England showed full well that she could do without it. The South was deluded by the insane idea of the gentleman from Indiana, and dreamed that a cotton famine would compel English interference. The history is written. The verdict is made up, and in the light of that verdict how silly and nonsensical are the vaporings of the gentleman from Indiana.

But again he declares that the total ruin of the American carrying trade is another reason why nations will not go to war with us. I blushed to hear an American statesman founding his hope of peace in the ruin of the American merchant marine. But aside from that, I beg the gentleman to remember that nations do not draw the sword from economical motives, and when angry they do not stop to see who may or may not be engaged in the carrying trade.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says that the bill providing the sum of $3,270,000 for defensive measures is a new departure. I admit that it is a new departure from the policy of latter-day statesmen, "a new departure" from that absurb and insane policy that has slumbered and slept, that has doled out the royal tribute of a rich and generous people with a niggardly hand, until we would not dare to accept the gage of battle with the most insignificant power, no matter how grievous the occasion, for fear of bombarded cities and ravaged coasts and a despoiled people.

But, sir, it is not a "new departure" from that wise and just policy pursued so successfully and so steadily from the administration of Washington down to that of Lincoln. During the fifty-eight years of Democratic power, from 1802 to 1860, the Government constructed and armed five forts on the northern frontier, sixty forts on the Atlantic and Gulf seaboards, and two on the Pacific coast, at a cost of over $30,000,000. The armament of these sixty-nine forts cost $15,000,000, or a total of $45,000,000, expended in fifty years of Democratic power for coast defense, and this too at a time when the total revenues of the Government ranged from $8,000,000 to $80,000,000, and without a surplus in the Treasury, and within that period we carried on four costly foreign wars. The result of this policy made us so secure at home that in 1860 it would have been impossible for a foreign ship to land a hostile foot upon our soil. I call the attention of those intensely Democratic gentlemen who cry out "new departure," that all these defensive works were created by Democratic administrations in obedience to declared Democratic policy. It was that policy which carried the hearts of the people.

During its sixty years of power it made every foreign war; resented every insult to or oppression of American citizens; it felt for the honor and cared for the glory of the country; it made it respected and honored abroad and secure at home; it carried the "ark of the covenant" of our national glory; it was militant, progressive, liberal; it bore the flag on sea and on land; it became the legitimist party of the country; it drew to it all that was young-hearted and young-thoughted and enthusiastic in the young republic, and the people loved and sustained it for sixty years and gave it power in the country and control over the country's destinies. Alas! it has under modern leadership become a niggard and a dotard, that mumbles over an obsolete creed and fumbles over the money-bags of the Treasury, that seems to care nothing for national honor or national safety, and recklessly imperils these by a pseudo economy as false as it is contemptible. No, Mr. Chairman, it is not a "new departure" that I advocate, but a resumption of that old Democratic policy commended by the wisdom and sanctioned by the steady practice of Jefferson and Monroe, of Madison and Jackson, of Van Buren and Polk.

But, sir, I must forbear for lack of time to further pursue and expose the fallacies of those who have inveighed against this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the highest and best authorities are agreed that three essentials enter into complete harbor and coast defense, and these are modern fortifications, modern guns of great power and long range, and a complete torpedo system. Right here let me expose another fallacy uttered by the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT]. These gentlemen declared that torpedoes alone were requisite to the defense of our harbors. What stuff and nonsense! Let Admiral Porter answer. He declared:

An insane idea seems to prevail that we can do without guns and ships, and that our harbors can be protected by torpedoes. There might be something in such an argument if we had forts that could keep out an enemy's fleet; but the party that can command the best ironclads and the heaviest ordnance will win.

Is not this declaration from our very best naval authority sufficient to demonstrate that gentlemen who speak of the all-sufficiency of the torpedo simply demonstrate their ignorance of the whole subject? Take not a professional but a common-sense view of this question. Torpedoes are of two kinds. The one is the stationary submerged mine—these are placed in the channel and so arranged as to explode when struck by a vessel. Their design is to prevent vessels from running batteries. Aware of the presence of torpedoes, but uncertain as to their location, the attacking fleet dare not attempt to run swiftly by shore batteries lest they strike the mine. Then there is the movable torpedo operated from shore, controlled and exploded by electricity. They can only be operated now one mile and a half from shore. Modern artillery casts a projectile weighing 2,000 pounds and has a range of from seven to ten miles.

A modern ship with modern guns may lie out at sea eight miles away and destroy a torpedo station at leisure and drive the operators from their galleries. Then she may move up and with her torpedo-boat find the planted torpedo and explode it harmlessly or remove it from the channel. At two miles range the movable torpedo is harmless. The mission of the torpedo is simply to delay the vessel while the shore batteries destroy her. Without guns to protect them they are useless and harmless; but with guns and forts they become a most useful and indispensable adjunct for defense, and prevent the swift passage of vessels by shore batteries as was done during our civil war by Admiral Farragut at Forts Saint Philip and Jackson, and by Admiral Porter at Vicksburg and Port Hudson. With the river at that time planted with torpedoes, the feat accomplished by those officers would have been attended with the utmost danger, if not rendered impossible. Such, then, is the design of torpedoes; most formidable when protected by forts and guns, and not at all formidable if not so protected.

In the next place, you must have modern forts. Your old forts of brick and mortar are no longer of avail. They are as obsolete in the art of war as the battle-ax of Richard or the spear of the crusader. Your strongest of these old forts is Fortress Monroe. Not long ago I was there. I asked the gallant and experienced soldier who commands there (General Tidball) how he would defend the fort if it were attacked by a modern fleet by modern guns. His reply, in substance, was: "We could do nothing, sir. It would be wise to take the garrison outside of the fort, and protect them from the flying brick and mortar which, under the pounding of modern missiles, would be more dangerous than the missiles themselves. Our largest guns would be of little or no use. The old fort would soon go to pieces and be untenable." And as this is the case with our strongest fort, so it is with all of them. They are obsolete, useless; and every dollar expended on them is a dollar thrown away.

As to what kind of forts we need it is useless to discuss here and now. The whole matter is a question for the engineers. They, together with the able and capable board provided for in this bill, must determine that question. They will solve it successfully and in favor of the security of the country if we furnish them with the necessary means to carry on the work.

And last, and most important of all, we must have modern guns of the largest caliber. Mr. Chairman, these guns can not be made in a week, or a month, or a year. I emphasize this statement, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that, according to the best and latest authority, with the most liberal appropriations and with the utmost haste that can be made it will require three years before the first gun can be delivered. The plant is costly and elaborate; the capacity to produce steel of quality good enough for modern guns has not been developed yet in this country, for the reason that no inducements have been held out to our American manufacturers to embark in the requisite costly plant and experiments.

Mr. HOLMAN. But will the gentleman allow me to suggest that war does not come upon a nation situated like ourselves in a day? In the very nature of things it is a question which would necessitate time before this country would engage in it. All of the time that such negotiations are pending could well be applied to the purpose the gentleman contemplates, if it should ever become necessary.

Mr. ELLIS. If I understand the gentleman from Indiana, he says that wars do not break out all of a sudden.

Mr. HOLMAN. Especially in a country whose geographical situation is such as ours.

Mr. ELLIS. Why, does the gentleman remember the teachings of history? Does he remember that it was but a few weeks that brought about the whole trouble between France and Germany; that it was an insulted French minister down at a watering place by an offended German monarch, and the sky that is all peaceful and beautiful and bright one day may be flaming the next with the anger and discordant with the thunders of the war god?

Mr. HOLMAN. And does not the gentleman know that the moment France laid her hands on Alsace and Lorraine that very moment war was inevitable, and that it was only a question of time as to when it would break out?

Mr. ELLIS. I know the old cause and the hereditary hatred that had existed for ages. But the immediate cause was but a few weeks before the first gun was fired.

Mr. EATON. The causes of the war between France and Germany were of long standing.

Mr. ELLIS. True enough. But the pretext for war was the work only of a day.

Mr. EATON. The ill-feeling between Germany and France has existed ever since the days of Napoleon. It was a hereditary hatred between the two nations.

Mr. ELLIS. I have already stated that the hatred was hereditary, extending back beyond the wars of Napoleon, but I again assert that the immediate pretext was the work only of a few days, and history will bear out my assertion. And history will also bear me out in the general assertion that nations, like individuals, quarrel swiftly and suddenly. And as to the isolation of our position alluded to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I can say that that argument is more respectable from its age than for its truth. In the days when the argument was new and entitled to respect it required the slow-sailing ship from thirty to fifty days to cross the ocean. Now the swift modern vessel crosses in eight days, and modern naval architects say it will be crossed in five days before another half decade shall have passed by.

But does the gentleman from Indiana seriously believe that we should wait until the quarrel begins before we proceed to the work of providing modern guns? It will require three years to produce the first gun. Would we quarrel three years before the fighting began? Would any nation calmly wait three or five years while we proceeded to get ready? Would not advantage be taken at once of our unarmed and unprepared condition? The gun-foundery board tell us that three years will be required before we can learn to make guns. Is it not the work of prudence to begin now? When would the gentleman begin? Shall we wait till war threatens us, as the gentleman advises, or until it is upon us? Shall we wait until we can read our duty to our defenseless country in the light of our burning cities? Shall we wait to be told our duty from the steel lips of modern guns, and in the deep, eloquent, but dreadful baying of the dogs of war from the iron sides of foreign men of war? Shall we wait until the white lips of our citizens, fleeing from their homes in the seaboard cities to escape the shot and the shell or the exactions of the ransom remind us of our duty to them? Is this the position of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]?

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the representatives of these people to begin the work of preparation now while peace smiles on us, while we have time to work and to experiment and calmly and with judgment place our country in a position for defense. I know of no better peace measure than a careful preparation for war.

But, sir, we are told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that the gun-foundery board have not agreed yet whether they will use the hammer or the hydraulic compresser in the manufacture of guns. Why, the gentleman did not read the very book he held in his hands. This board says on page 48:

> The board is unanimous in approving the use of the press for all forging purposes, and recommends it to all who may embark in the manufacture of gun material for the Government.

So that the gentleman from New York, who based his entire speech upon the report of the gun-foundery board, which report he held in his hand, has not read that report. He deprecates any expenditure of the public moneys for the purposes of making guns until we know what kind of guns we want. That is a proposition upon which the gentleman and I are agreed.

But who proposes an expenditure of money ignorantly? In strict accordance with the recommendations of the board the majority of the Committee on Appropriations have agreed merely to make such appropriations as shall encourage the manufacturers of this country to undertake the production of adequate gun material for the purpose of making guns. Not a gun is to be bargained for, not a gun is to be bought, not a gun is to be paid for until the guns or the material shall have been made and fully tested to the satisfaction of the country, and this before any contract even shall be made. In order to secure contracts the manufacturers must go to an expense, according to the lowest estimate which has been fixed by this gun board, of $560,000 for a plant. They must go to that expense for machinery before they can begin the manufacture of the necessary material for the gun, let alone the gun itself. And then when this expense is incurred and he has experimented and produced approved material and an approved gun equal to the best guns in the world, then and not until then can he secure a contract under the appropriation provided for in this bill. Knowing that we must have guns and that Americans should make them and that they will not make them unless they are paid, the committee drew this bill in perfect accordance with the recommendation of the gun-foundery board. I quote from the report of that board at page 48:

> A state with any pretensions to military power should provide itself with factory facilities on a sufficient scale to perform the work of establishing standards, making experimental guns, and fabricating cannon on a moderate scale; but it is not considered judicious to concentrate in the Government establishments all the work of fabrication or to include within their operations the preparation of such material as can be provided by the private industries of the country. In the case under consideration the purchase of the steel required for cannon will stimulate our own manufacturers and interest them in the operations of the Government.
> The board is thus led to the conclusion that it is not advisable to embark in the establishment of a gun foundery, properly so called, but that it is more judicious to establish gun factories, and to purchase the material from our manufacturers.
> At present the steel manufacturers of our country are not prepared to produce the material required for the larger calibers, and the important question arises, what means shall be adopted to induce them to study the subject and embark in the manufacture on a large scale. They can not be expected to do this at a sacrifice of their own interests. This object can only be achieved by holding out a fair prospect of ultimate remuneration for the expenditures necessary to undertake the work, and this can only be done by the action of Congress.
> If, then, Congress shall conclude to arm the country, it will be necessary that a sum of money shall be fixed as a permanent yearly appropriation to be expended for this purpose, the amount to be assigned proportionally between the War and Navy Departments. With such a guarantee against loss the board is satisfied that the required material for cannon will be forthcoming from our own steel works.
> It would not be necessary for the Government to be associated with a large number of firms for the supply of its material, for it is probable that the private establishments that would take up the subject would only be those with large available funds which they would be willing to put into a special plant, and for remuneration on which they would be willing to wait a reasonable time. The permanent appropriation would give them surety of ultimate profit, the only condition being success in providing the material that would be indicated in their contracts. From personal intercourse with some of the leading manufacturers the board is led to believe that the plan will have the effect of guiding the private industries of the country to the aid of the Government in developing this work of national importance.

It may be added that although the manufacture of armor plates for ships and fortifications was not referred to this board for investigation, the erection of plant for providing modern cannon would go far toward reducing the outlay requisite to enable our great steel manufacturers to meet another pressing want of the Government.

The chief expense to be considered by private parties is that of the forge, but by the substitution of the hydraulic press for the hammer economy will be consulted and better results obtained. The board is unanimous in approving the use of the press for all forging purposes, and recommends it to all who may embark in the manufacture of gun metal for the Government.

The provisions of the bill presented by the majority for the encouragement of private manufacturers to produce gun material is in the direct line of this recommendation. In only a single regard have we differed with the board, and that difference I shall note before I shall have done. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] congratulates himself that in the substitute offered by him for the bill he encourages the private manufacturers to embark in the manufacture of guns and gun material. Sir, it is a funny mode of encouragement. Let us look at it. He wants to encourage the producers of steel in this country in the manufacture of material for guns. How does he propose to do it? Let his substitute answer. The gentleman can correct me if I misstate it. He proposes to sell them our old iron obsolete guns at "reasonable prices," to allow them to go into the purchase of the enormous plants required for this purpose, and then, after they have paid out a great price for our old Rodman guns, for our old Dahlgren guns, and all this old, decaying, and obsolete material with which our forts are encumbered and which are not fit even for old metal, and after they have purchased it and paid us a good price for it, they may go on and experiment and test, at an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars at least, without a guarantee that this Government will ever appropriate any money for the purchase of the guns when manufactured. This is beautiful encouragement—lovely encouragement. I can already see the smiles of joy on the faces of the steel manufacturers and hear their voices of gratitude at the magnificent encouragement held out to them by their special friend and champion.

But the majority of the committee, acting under the line of the advice given by this gun board, holds out to them this inducement: "We will make a permanent annual appropriation of $1,000,000 for five years; and if you will go to work and increase your plant and produce material for guns that will bear the test and prove equal to the best guns anywhere, then with the man who successfully solves this problem we will contract to the full extent."

But again, sir, we are told we have not agreed upon a material for guns. The opponents of this bill who say this did not read this last authority—the report of the gun-foundery board. They will find that they have abandoned the wire gun, the cast-iron gun with steel jacket; they have abandoned every other material; and France, and England, and Germany, and Russia, and Italy, and Spain, and all other civilized nations have agreed that steel is the only material and the steel gun the only gun that is fit for the public service.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] says modern guns have not been tested. Why, sir, here is the report of the bombardment of Alexandria, where seven English vessels were engaged; where over 3,000 shots were fired; where 131,000 pounds of powder were burned. Modern guns were tested, and they did their work with a precision that was unparalleled. And yet after the action was all over and the Egyptian defenses had been battered down and their defenders put to rout, this report says, and it is an official report of the engagement:

Not a gun was disabled nor the fighting qualities of a single ship affected.

So it seems, then, that this modern artillery has been tested by battering charges, tested by actual engagements, tested by the emergencies of a bombardment that required the guns to be fired as fast as the charges could be placed in them for the purpose of breaching the walls of the fort before them, and not one single gun was injured or disabled throughout the bombardment; and thus that argument of the gentleman from Ohio that modern guns have not been tested falls to the ground.

In his extreme opposition to this bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] warns us of the waste of money in fruitless experiments by our ordnance officers. The Ordnance Office of the War Department needs no defense at my hands. If it has failed to supply guns and material the fault rests not with that department, but with the niggardly action of Congress. It has never had money enough within my term of service, now nearly ten years, to do anything with. It has done for the best, and if some of its experiments in trying to make something out of nothing have failed who can wonder?

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in his assaults upon that department makes a blunder, the only excuse for which is that it was unintentional. Not content with going back before the flood and citing Rodman's evidence given in 1868, he makes this declaration and signs it, and six other gentlemen who should know better sign it with him. He declares in his minority report, pages 4 and 5:

And ever since that time the result of every trial of guns which have burst, and of which steel formed a component and principal part, it has been noted that it was the steel part of the construction which most disastrously ruptured. The last venture of the Army Ordnance Department was "the four improved breech-loading 12-inch rifle guns" provided for in the act of June 13, 1881, known as the Crispin patent guns, in which the principal part relied upon to give strength was a heavy steel breech-block "receiver and reinforcer." These strong guns, as to the success of which the Chief of Ordnance had "not the suggestion of a doubt," and upon the success of which he was "willing to stake his reputation," and the same guns, which it appears it was the intention of the department to introduce into service without any trial, and go on and produce more of the same kind before the first lot, costing $61,000 each, had been tested, failed most disastrously. The contractor said of the result:

"492. We made a 12-inch breech-loading cannon and an 8-inch one. They were made after what is known as the Crispin design. * * * We used the best imported steel for the work that was obtainable. The rifled tube made of wrought iron. And yet, when the 12-inch gun was taken to the proving-grounds at Sandy Hook, after the firing of only a few rounds, the steel breech broke off at its thickest part and blew out. The 8-inch gun, made in the same way, also broke, and its breech blew out after firing a few rounds. This method of gun-making is a very expensive one, the steel breech costing enormously." * * *

And in continuation he said:

"496. A series of ominous incidents have occurred in the gun tests: The more or less free opening of welds in every gun tested, and the demoralization of the material at the seat of the charge; the cracking from breech to muzzle of the steel tube and jacket in one of the early converted guns; * * * the blowing out of the tube of the 10-inch heavy muzzle-loading rifle at the fourth or fifth fire through the opening of a defective weld, * * * to say nothing of the friction and the enormous power required to tear off the muzzle of the gun, the body of the gun sustaining no apparent injury; the discontinued proof of the new 12.25-inch rifle after thirty rounds through fear of a similar accident; the complete cracking through necessitating early repair of the tube of the 11-inch breech-loading rifle near the seat of the gas-check (this gun has since burst, after a few additional rounds, rupturing the steel by blowing out the breech, but without injury to the cast-iron); * * * the destruction, a few days since, of the new 8-inch converted breech-loader by rupturing at the third fire the heavy steel jacket in its thickest part, the gun body, as usual, being unimpaired. Such a series of accidents or failures can not certainly by any ingenuity of reasoning be interpreted as complimentary to either the steel or the wrought iron, separately or in combination."—Boston Herald interview with Mr. William P. Hunt, president South Boston Iron Company, November 20, 1881.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania was and is utterly incorrect in this whole statement, unintentionally no doubt, but nevertheless incorrect.

Mr. RANDALL. Did not three out of the four guns burst?

Mr. ELLIS. The four guns not only did not burst, but in fact they were never made.

Mr. RANDALL. There were four guns that Mr. Benét staked his reputation on, and three of them burst.

Mr. ELLIS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the guns were never constructed. They were ordered; they were to have been of cast-iron tubes with jackets of steel and steel breech, but General Benét condemned the steel that was imported for them and the guns were never made; and the guns which the gentleman says burst were, one of them, a 12-inch gun converted from a 15-inch smooth-bore by inserting a steel tube, and the other was an 8-inch rifle converted from a 10-inch Rodman. These old iron guns converted did burst, and the four which the minority report declared to have burst never were made. The gentleman should certainly correct his statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I will either correct it or give my authority.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman will have to correct it, then.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know about that.

Mr. ELLIS. I do know about it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman from Louisiana allow me right here a moment? I understood him to say that the wire gun had failed.

Mr. ELLIS. I said that it and all other kinds of guns had been abandoned except guns of steel, and that these had been adopted by the civilized world.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Perhaps the gentleman misunderstands my question in that particular. Wire guns are steel-wire guns.

Mr. ELLIS. I understand that; but the gun I refer to is a built-up gun, a steel tube with a steel jacket, entirely of steel throughout.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understood the gentleman to say that the wire gun was a failure.

Mr. ELLIS. I did not say it was a failure; I said that it had been abandoned, together with other guns, and the steel gun had been adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Allow me to refer the gentleman to page 31 of the report of the gun-foundery board, where it says:

Recently, however, the matter has been taken up by Sir William Armstrong, who has manfactured several wire guns.

And the report goes on to state:

The royal gun factory has taken up the subject and has matured designs for experiment on a large scale. In its designs the longitudinal strength is obtained by means of steel segmental hoops placed between layers of wire.

The following is the present state of the wire-gun question in England:

Manufacture of Sir William Armstrong:

Under trial, 10.2-inch breech-loading gun.

To be tried, 6-inch breech-loading gun, 6.3-inch muzzle-loading howitzer.

Manufacture of royal gun factories:

Under manufacture, 10-inch breech-loading howitzer.

Recommended for manufacture, 15-inch breech-loading gun of sixty-three tons.

So that the wire gun is now the gun with which the Woolwich arsenal is making its great experiment.

Mr. ELLIS. I will state again, and I will be borne out by the assertion of the report of this board which I hold in my hand and which can not be gainsaid or denied—

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. And I hold it in my hand.

Mr. ELLIS. That steel has been adopted by every nation in Europe as the material of which guns are made; and that to-day in France and in Germany, in England and in Russia, 160,000 men in private establishments and government establishments are engaged in making steel guns.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There is no difference between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. ELLIS. Then why does the gentleman consume my time uselessly?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman said that the wire gun had been abandoned or given up. I call the attention of the House to the fact that it is the gun now under experiment in the Woolwich arsenal.

Mr. ELLIS. In one shop.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In a government shop in England.

Mr. ELLIS. In one government shop.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. England has only one government shop, the Woolwich arsenal.

Mr. ELLIS. And the only shop in England in which it is under experiment. In fact England, after expending millions upon its shop at the Woolwich arsenal, is getting its guns to-day from Armstrong and Whitworth.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. She has given her first order within the year to those two.

Mr. ELLIS. Now as to the waste of money, as to embarking in reckless speculation, I desire to ask the cool, calm, considerate attention of this House to the provisions of this bill:

For the protection, preservation, and repair, and for the construction of work on fortifications already begun, and for the construction of new works for the defense of the following-named ports:

Giving the six deep-water ports of the United States—

Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and San Francisco, $1,000,000.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says there was no estimate for that. The estimate as prepared by the engineers was $4,000,000; but Secretary Lincoln, hopeless of obtaining that appropriation, hopeless of getting it all, as long as the policy which had prevailed for six or eight years continued, cut down the estimate, but sent in a supplemental estimate asking for $1,000,000 for fortifications, and that is allowed in this bill. Then we have in the bill—

For the care, preservation, and improvement of fortifications, and for the commencement of the erection of such new works as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War at other ports of the United States, $300,000.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], probably with a view of exciting sectional jealousy and making members who represent Mobile and Galveston and other shallow-water harbors of the United States a little bit jealous, endeavored to make them believe that we had only sought to take care of our home harbors, and asked why we did not appropriate for other harbors of the United States. Sir, it was for this reason, because nearly every shallow-water harbor of the United States has already a fort of some kind. It is true they are obsolete. But by the conversion of 10-inch smooth-bore Rodman guns into 8-inch rifled guns we have produced a gun which has been thoroughly tested, and has been found capable of penetrating ten inches of armor at 1,000 yards.

Now, the majority of the light-draught armored vessels of the world have less than ten inches of armor. We have, therefore, in these 8-inch rifled guns, already converted from the 10-inch smooth-bore Rodman guns, a weapon which will enable us to defend these shallow-water harbors or to make some adequate defense of them. Only the light-armed cruisers, with light armor and light draught, can get into these harbors, while vessels bearing eighteen, twenty, twenty-four, and thirty inches of armor, like the Lepanto and other heavy vessels, can not ride into the shallow harbors. We have enough of these 8-inch guns to provide a few for each shallow harbor, and with hastily constructed earthworks a tolerable defense could be made. Not so with those harbors whose depth of water allows the heaviest armored vessels to pass in and ride in safety. It was deemed necessary that the deep-water ports should be fortified, because in case of war they would be the harbors of refuge for the pent-up commerce of the country. It was deemed necessary that attention should be paid at once to the armament of these great ports, especially New York city and the other rich and powerful cities, because of their great wealth, their vast population, and their necessity to the business of the whole country.

Mr. Chairman, what would be the financial condition of this country if New York were under bombardment or in the hands of a foreign foe? Even as the human body, when fierce congestion grasps and binds the heart and paralyzes the flow of the warm blood to brain and muscle and nerve, sinks and faints to death, so would this great country feel the pang and the distress of financial ruin if its great financial heart were grasped and wrung by hostile hands.

And as with New York so in less degree with the other great cities that are built upon deep water. Their wealth amounting to more than one-fifth of the entire wealth of the Union; their population, aggregating nearly 5,000,000 of souls; the commerce with which they would be choked in case of war would make these cities the first and chief objects of attack, and hence the necessity of providing for their defense as swiftly and effectively as possible.

In providing for the purchase of torpedoes preference was given to the movable torpedo, propelled and operated from shore. We believed that it was far superior to the submarine mine, that waits to be struck by the enemy before it explodes. The movable torpedo is guided to its mark by electricity and then exploded against the bottom of the hostile vessel. The one is operated intelligently and the other by chance, and hence the preference of the committee for the movable mine.

The next paragraph provides for "the armament of seacoast fortifications." This is the bugaboo provision; and I desire to call the attention of the House especially to its language. It will be seen that not one dollar is to be expended, not one dollar of expenditure is to be contracted for, not a single voucher upon the Treasury is to be drawn until the manufacturers have increased their plant, have made the material, have produced the guns, the best in the world—not till then will any manufacturer receive a contract. I invite the attention of the committee to the language in which this provision is drawn; for if human ingenuity has ever been taxed, it was taxed in this instance to throw around the Government every safeguard which could be provided in the way of legislation:

For the armament of seacoast fortifications, including the manufacture and conversion of heavy guns and carriages, projectiles, fuses, powder, and implements, high explosives, their trial and proof, and to test the maximum velocity of projectiles, and purchase of material, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, including the purchase of machine-guns, &c., $600,000.

In the expenditure of this appropriation discretion is to be left to the wisdom and experience of men who are in charge of this branch of the service. The machine-guns to be purchased will be the Gatling, the Hotchkiss, or the Nordenfeldt, as the Department and the board may think best.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I concur in the propriety of the provision leaving that question to them.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly. We can pursue no other safe course.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But I was referring to the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOUSE], who in his remarks spoke of the provision as if it were confined to the Gatling guns.

Mr. ELLIS. That is not the provision of the bill. I believe, however, the gentleman from Michigan is right in the belief that there is no gun like the Gatling gun. I know no arm in the world to be compared with it as an infantry arm. Now, listen:

For the procurement of heavy steel rifle guns and carriages for the armament of the deep-water ports of the United States a permanent annual appropriation of $1,000,000 is hereby made, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for and during the term of five years from the 30th of June, 1884—

Remember, gentlemen of the committee, that before a manufacturer can prepare himself for the purpose of entering upon this work he must expend between $500,000 and $700,000 for his plant—

Provided, That in so far as practicable said sum shall be so expended as to induce some private manufacturer or manufacturers of the United States, who may be best prepared and who will agree to increase their plant to meet the requirements of the Government and to undertake the work, to furnish steel tubes, jackets, plugs, and other necessary material, or sample blank guns of cast or wrought steel, which material or blank guns shall be taken and thoroughly tested by the United States.

In other words, the manufacturer must increase his plant, and must make material and guns which, when subjected to adequate tests, shall be found to be equal to the best material and the best guns in the world, and not until then shall the Government contract with him; and if he does all this, then he should have the contract and reap the reward of his outlay of capital and energy.

Then away with the idea which has been so assiduously circulated that it is proposed to squander this money of the people upon useless and senseless experiments. The bill is most carefully guarded. Not the ingenuity of the gentleman from Indiana nor yet the artful assertions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania can unmake or mar one word which I say in regard to the safeguards thrown around the expenditure of the appropriation.

But I read again from the bill: "Said guns to be rifled steel guns." That is the united opinion of the last and best authority in the world of our own and foreign authorities. It then goes on, and I am glad to see in all the balance of the amendment the minority and the majority agree. It is provided that these tests shall be at the expense of the manufacturer. No test is to be paid for by the Government of the United States; but the manufacturer himself is to go to work, increase his plant, make material, make his guns, bring them to the officer at his own expense, and then when tested and found equal to the best in the world we propose to contract with him under the restrictions that the price of the guns shall not exceed by more than 10 per cent. the cost of similar guns in Europe. I defy any member of this committee then to say that this is an extravagant bill or that the interests of the Government have not been perfectly guarded by its provisions, or that this Congress should not here and now under this bill or one like it begin the too long-neglected work of providing for the perfect armament of our coasts and harbors.

The committee has differed, Mr. Chairman, with this gun-foundery board in one particular. The board was composed of the following officers: E. Simpson, rear-admiral, United States Navy, president of the board; E. O. Matthews, captain, United States Navy; T. G. Baylor, colonel of ordnance, United States Army; Henry L. Abbot, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, brevet brigadier-general, United States Army; Samuel S. Elder, major, Second Artillery, United States Army; W. H. Jaques, lieutenant, United States Navy, member and secretary of the board. They recommend that the United States in providing its armament should adopt the principle which the Government of France has adopted; that is, to encourage private manufacturers to produce steel and other material necessary for gun construction, and then to provide two gun-factories—one for the Army and one for the Navy—where the material might be taken and fabricated into guns. And the reason they urged was this, that in case a private manufacturer in the United States solved this problem of gun construction and the Government contracted with him it would be at his mercy, as Germany is to-day at the mercy of Krupp. They themselves point out instances of attempted imposition by contractors upon France in which I find our safety. I do not want to see the Government embark in the expense of a great Government plant. I do not care to see that. I believe in the encouragement of our own manufacturers. I believe in the encouragement of our own laborers. I believe in the encouragement of our own steel producers. I believe everything pertaining to the defense of the country should come from American soil and be fabricated by American hands.

The board says that a manufacturer like Krupp may force a monopoly upon the Government, and hence they would have us procure our steel from private manufacturers, and then in Government gun factories make the guns. They recite one instance where the French Government brought a contractor to terms by sending an order abroad to be filled. Our Government could under similar circumstances do the same thing. Hence I see no necessity whatever for the Government to embark in the work and expense of gun factories. Let the manufacturer do the whole work. Before the war we made the best guns in the world. Provide the money, let our American manufacturers see work and emoluments ahead, and they will give you guns equal, yes, I believe superior, to any in the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, as an additional safeguard for the Government, the committee has in this bill provided for an advisory board to advise with the Secretary of War in regard to the expenditure of the moneys herein appropriated. As I have asserted before, harbor-defense must embrace forts, guns, and torpedoes, and these must be constructed and devised with reference to each other in order to insure harmonious and homogeneous action. And so this board is to consist of the General of the Division of the Atlantic, an officer of all arms; of the Chief of Ordnance, and the president of the ordnance board, who will supervise the construction of the great guns; of the Chief of Engineers, who will build the forts; and of the commandant of the Willet's Point torpedo school, who is authority on torpedoes. The hands, then, into which the money herein appropriated is to go are those of Secretary Lincoln, aided and advised by General Winfield S. Hancock, General S. V. Benét, Colonel Baylor, General John Newton, and General Abbot.

Mr. Chairman, the opponents of this bill have whispered it about on this side of the House that if the large sum of money were appropriated now a portion of it would be devoted to partisan purposes in the ensuing Presidential election. To the honor of this House I will say no such charge has been publicly made. But it has been privately whispered about. If said at all, it was meet that it should be whispered, and then not in the honest day, but in the sinister night. Sir, if any impression was made by statements so inexcusably groundless, it must be removed at once upon hearing the names of those into whose hands this appropriation is to go—hands as pure, as devoted, and as stainless as any that were ever uplifted here toward yonder honored desk or rested in service upon the altar of country.

Sir, in the study I have given to this subject, in the labors that I have performed in seeking to guard the Government from useless expenditure and at the same time to begin the work of arming our defenseless seaboard, I have sought only security at home, the restoration of our lost prestige, and the ability to preserve the peace by that moral force which is the child of the consciousness of power abroad and security at home. I desire to see once more the title of American citizen honored abroad, a shield and a guarantee against wrong or insult, and our ability to maintain peace no longer measured by our capacity to apologize or to submit to disgraceful treaties.

Mr. Chairman, in my brief service in this House how many times has the blush of shame come to our cheeks because of unavenged insults upon land and sea? Why, not many years ago an American ship was run down upon the high seas by a Spanish cruiser and her crew captured and taken to Santiago de Cuba and shot to death with musketry, while the flag of the Republic was trampled under the Spaniard's foot in the mire and dust on the deck of the outraged ship; and we submitted to this burning disgrace and humiliation, admitted an apology and the acceptance of $500 a life for the lives of each of our American citizens sacrificed! I was ashamed some time ago when there came an interruption in our relations with Germany. When the matter came before this House, and a member, whose temper was regarded as swift, and whose tongue contained none of the oiliness of diplomatic deceit, rose to speak, there was a commotion, a tremor, an effort to suppress his utterances, a cry of "Regular order," the hiss of "Hush" and "Whist," as if a boding fear dwelt in each heart that something might be uttered to offend the German Emperor or his stern chancellor. It seemed to me that the trepidation could not have been greater had we known that the chancellor at the head of one of his iron regiments was charging along the corridor to arrest and incarcerate the members of this House.

Again I declare if we would preserve peace we must prepare for war; if we would emulate the works and carry out the policy of our fathers we must make every city by the sea and every flag where floats our commerce safe and secure. In our later provisions for a navy nothing has been done looking to the creation of strong battle-ships capable of meeting a modern naval power in conflict upon the seas. Our cruisers now in course of construction and those contemplated by the Senate amendments are mere commerce-destroyers, to prey upon the peaceful trading-ship. It is not pretended that they can ever meet and withstand the battering of modern guns that are now borne by armed ships of war. Our defenses must then be on shore. Economy! Why, not four days ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and all his associates of the minority gave their sanction to an appropriation of $24,500,000 for the support of the Army.

Back of the Army is a possible American militia force of 5,000,000 of men. No one dreams of invading us. There is no prospect of war; no, not even of an Indian war. We will never be attacked in the interior by any nation. Why, then, this vast appropriation of nearly $25,000,000 for a mere pay-roll, a mere parade? Again, these seven economical gentlemen approve an appropriation of $14,300,000 for a Navy without battle-ships, for a mere show and a pay-roll, that can not attack and can not defend. Economy! You gentlemen had better rise up and tell this country why you approve of an expenditure of $39,000,000 for defense and attack when you never will be called upon to defend and never can attack, and then refuse, under the false pretense of economy, to expend $3,250,000 for defense of your only weak points, the points at which you will assuredly be attacked sooner or later; in fact, the only points that can ever be assailed by a foreign foe. Such pretended economy is as farcical as it is false.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] declares that we need no other defense than that which is afforded by American manhood. Mr. Chairman, no one shall go before me in lofty appreciation of American manhood. With me it is not a mere sentiment evolved from national pride, but a living realization from my own experience. In our civil war I fought with the one section against the other, and I saw such feats of valor performed by the soldiers of the one section beneath the flag that floats above you, sir, that in the fierce glow of the battle-fires its silver stars seemed to burn with an inspired splendor, and its stripes seemed baptized with a new and holier light [applause], while those with whom I fought under their storm-born banner did so cover its meteoric life over and over with martial glory until it did sometimes seem the bravest battle-flag that ever floated over heroic hosts or waved along the fire-fringed front of battle. [Applause.]

But grand and heroic as it is, tell me, ye wise men of the minority, of what avail would American manhood be to meet and resist walls of iron and guns of steel of one hundred tons hurling projectiles of two tons' weight a distance of ten miles, unless the manhood had guns and walls of equal power? Could American manhood, without the appliances of modern warfare, defend New York, or your own city, sir, with its hundred thousand homes, or imperial San Francisco, that sits by the beautiful Golden Gate on the Western sea? Can flesh withstand iron? Is muscle harder than steel? One single Italian vessel (the Lepanto) could destroy all of American manhood in one day if pent up within one city, and yet her iron sides would not be scarred and not one drop of blood would stain her decks. Give to American manhood the guns and the forts and it is invincible. Without them, and against modern implements of destruction, they would be but as lambs led to the slaughter.

Away, then, with this silly prattle about American manhood. It is as silly as it is to expend $39,000,000 for defense when we will never be attacked, and for attack when we can never assume the offensive, and then refuse to give $3,000,000 to defend the only points at which we ever can be attacked, and which sooner or later we will be called upon to defend. How long will this House tolerate such statesmanship as this? How long shall our patience be abused by such pretenses of economy?

Representatives of the American people, I beg you to awake to a true realization of the defenseless condition of your great cities, of your entire seaboard, and to pass, if not this bill, then some other that will be adequate to the beginning of the great work of rendering impregnable and invulnerable our common country, for whose honor and glory and security alone I have spoken. [Great applause.]

APPENDIX.

A bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the following sums are hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, as hereinafter provided, for the following purposes, namely:

For the protection, preservation, repair, and for the construction of work on fortifications already begun, and for the construction of new works for the defense of the following-named ports: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and San Francisco, $1,000,000.

For the care, preservation, and improvement of fortifications, and for the commencement of the erection of such new works as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War at other ports of the United States, $300,000.

For the purchase of such submarine movable torpedoes, propelled and controlled by power operated from shore stations, as may be recommended by the board of engineers of the Army of the United States and approved by the Secretary of War, $100,000; for purchase of adopted pattern of submarine mines for harbor defense, $50,000; for continuation of torpedo experiments and for practical instruction of engineer troops in the details of the service, $20,000; in all, $170,000.

For the armament of seacoast fortifications, including the manufacture and conversion of heavy guns and carriages, projectiles, fuses, powder, and implements, high explosives, their trial and proof, and to test the maximum velocity of projectiles and purchase of material, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, including the purchase of machine-guns, and compensation of draughtsmen on gun construction while employed in the Ordnance Bureau, $600,000.

For the procurement of heavy steel rifle guns and carriages for the armament of the deep-water ports of the United States a permanent annual appropriation of $1,000,000 is hereby made, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for and during the term of five years from the 30th of June, 1884: Provided, That in so far as practicable said sum shall be so expended as to induce some private manufacturer or manufacturers of the United States, who may be best prepared and who will agree to increase their plant to meet the requirements of the Government and to undertake the work, to furnish steel tubes, jackets, plugs, and other necessary material, or sample blank guns of cast or wrought steel, which material or blank guns shall be taken and thoroughly tested by the United States; and if found in all respects satisfactory, then the Secretary of War shall contract with the manufacturer who is best prepared to execute the work, and who has furnished the most satisfactory material for guns or the best sample blank guns, for the necessary material or unfinished guns to the full amount of the appropriation herein made. Said guns to be rifled steel guns of not less than ten inches caliber, or in lieu thereof the materials to be suitable for making such guns: Provided, That enough money shall be reserved of this appropriation to provide the necessary carriages for said guns and for their thorough test: And provided further, That the Secretary of War may, out of the first annual appropriation of $1,000,000, expend not more than $500,000 for such 12-inch rifle mortars or guns as immediate exigencies may seem to require: And provided further, That the cost of the steel guns or material herein provided for shall not exceed by more than 10 per cent. the cost of similar guns and material in England or Europe.

It shall be unlawful, from and after the approval of this act, to construct more than one rifle cannon, of any particular material, caliber, or kind, at the cost of the United States, until one or more of such cannon of the required caliber has been publicly subjected to crucial test for the determination of its endurance, and shall have stood such test to the satisfaction of the board provided for hereinafter, and demonstrated to be equal to the best guns known to any military service.

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the various calibers, lengths of bore, greatest and least admissible weights of guns, together with the weights of projectiles for each caliber of all of the various calibers required for the service, together with the number of each caliber required, to be determined, and to make the same known to the public without unnecessary delay, by public advertisement, so as to encourage private manufacturers of cannon and material to produce, test, and offer cannon and material of established endurance and power for sale to the Government.

And it shall be the further duty of the Secretary of War to devise liberal and fair regulations regarding the proof and purchase of guns, and upon receiving due notice that any projector or maker has a gun ready for proof, to promptly appoint officers to be present to witness the firing and report the facts with regard to all trial guns so offered for proof by private manufacturers who desire to produce armament by conversion of obsolete guns on hand or according to special designs, and to secure for service only the best and most effective kinds, and at the lowest prices of those kinds which best meet the requirements of service, of whatever material they may be made, whether such cannon shall be produced by private manufacturers or otherwise.

But in all cases, except where the trial guns are projected by officials and completed in Government establishments, the guns and all the expenses of the test must be provided and borne at the cost of the manufacturer of the guns, and are not to become chargeable against the United State unless it shall be established by the proof that the cannon of each kind and caliber, of whatever material they may be made, shall fully meet all the requirements of the service.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of aiding the Secretary of War in the expenditure and application of the sums hereby appropriated, an advisory board of five military officers is hereby created, consisting of the general commanding the division of the Atlantic, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of Engineers, the president of the ordnance board, and the commandant of the Willet's Point torpedo school; and should any vacancy at any time occur in said board, the same shall be filled by the Secretary of War, who shall detail the officer succeeding to the vacancy for service upon the board. Said board shall examine and report to the Secretary of War the different ports where fortifications are most needed, the kind and character of fortifications best adapted at each point, and the amount of said appropriation to be expended at each place; also the kind and character of guns, torpedoes, and torpedo approaches, and other means and appliances necessary for the defense of the country; and shall examine and report to the Secretary of War upon any subject pertaining to the expenditure of any money appropriated by this act which said Secretary may at any time require of them in writing. The Secretary of War is authorized to detail to act as secretary to said advisory board a commissioned officer of the Army; and all expenses of said board incurred in the line of duty imposed by this act may be paid out of moneys herein appropriated.

SEC. 3. That section 3709 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so that its provisions which require that purchases shall be made from the lowest bidder after advertisement shall not apply to ordnance and their carriages, projectiles, gunpowder, and other war explosives, nor to the materials entering into the manufacture thereof, and whatever is requisite in military experiments with them.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read as follows:

That out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the following sums are hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, as hereinafter provided, for the following purposes, namely:

For the protection, preservation, repair, and for the construction of work on fortifications already begun, and for the construction of new works for the defense of the following-named ports: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and San Francisco, $1,000,000,

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order against the language—

And for the construction of new works for the defense of the following-named ports: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and San Francisco.

But before entering upon that I want to know from the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] whether he wishes to perfect his bill in any way and then allow a vote to be taken between the bill reported by the majority and the substitute proposed by the minority. I would like also to have the sense of the committee whether they desire to sit now till the bill is completed. For my part I am willing to obey the wish of the committee.

Mr. ELLIS. I am entirely willing to accommodate myself to the wishes of the House. It is now half past 5 o'clock, and I do not think there will be anything to-morrow that will prevent us from considering this bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman gave notice he meant to insist on a vote to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question pending is the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELLIS. I propose to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, these bills shall be read and that a vote be taken on the substitute. If it is carried, there is an end of it. If it is not carried——

Mr. RANDALL. That is a fair proposition. But I want to reserve the right to make the point of order on that portion of the bill which relates to a permanent appropriation for five years.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the better course would be to take a vote on the substitute as a whole. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. RANDALL. It is apparent that the House desires to go on with the bills now, and I am ready to do so. I make the point of order against the language I have read.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing not to take any advantage on that point of order, but to proceed to vote on the substitute.

Mr. ELLIS. I think that will be best. It is a difference between two ideas, two systems.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the new departure on which we seek to test the sense of the House. I am willing to have a vote taken on the substitute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it understood that when the vote is taken we will have the right to go on and perfect whichever bill may be adopted as a whole, and that there will be the same right to make points of order?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not waive the right to make the point of order against the permanent appropriation for five years. It is only the first point of order that I propose to waive.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman agreed a moment ago it was a conflict between two systems.

Mr. RANDALL. On the appropriation for five years I do not waive the right as to the point of order; on the other I do. I now submit, with the concurrence of the gentleman from Louisiana, the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say the proper course under the rule would be, in the first place, to perfect the original bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I did not hear objection to a test-vote on the substitute.

Mr. ELLIS. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee gives unanimous consent, it may come directly to a vote upon the substitute; but if there is objection, it can not be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to occupy the attention of the House just for a moment. I desire to strike out in the substitute, on page 2, lines 23 and 24, "for the purchase of machine-guns of the latest improvement, $20,000," and to insert that same matter in the following paragraph, of course increasing the appropriation there from $300,000 to $320,000. I presume there is no objection to that. The words stricken out would be inserted in the paragraph beginning in line 25 just as they appear in the preceding paragraph.

Mr. ELLIS. Is the gentleman from Indiana proposing to amend the substitute?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELLIS. All right.

Mr. HOLMAN. My amendment merely throws the two paragraphs into one.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course I desire to secure a vote in the House by yeas and nays, so that there may be a record of the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to taking a vote on the substitute as a whole?

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to make an inquiry as to how the vote is to be taken, whether in the Committee of the Whole by tellers, or in the House by a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I will consent to take it by a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. There must be some agreement by which the bill is to be reported to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to be cut off from my right to move to recommit.

Mr. CALKINS. There is no way of getting the bill into the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the modification of the substitute suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

There being no objection, the modification was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move the substitute as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition that a vote be taken upon the substitute as modified? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a verbal change in the substitute. On page 4, in line 11 of section 2, strike out the word "if" and insert the word "unless;" and at the end of the section add the words "the guns shall not be purchased for the United States;" so that it will read:

And unless it shall be demonstrated that such cannon is equal as in power and endurance to the best guns known to any military service, the guns shall not be purchased for the United States.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 80, noes 70.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that we had better adjourn now. It is nearly 6 o'clock, and we have made an arrangement which is perfectly satisfactory and will facilitate action.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to the substitute.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 8.

Mr. DUNHAM and others. No quorum!

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. ELLIS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 104, noes 22.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point that a gentleman must rise in his place when he raises the point of no quorum.

Mr. CALKINS. We will come to a vote where a quorum will be required. If there is a quorum here, then let us go on; if not, then there is no use in our staying here and punishing ourselves.

Mr. HOLMAN. When there is no quorum it is the duty of the Chair to direct the roll to be called.

The CHAIRMAN. From the announcement of the tellers it appears that there is no quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk began the calling of the roll, but was interrupted by

Mr. THOMPSON, who said: I have consulted with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], and I ask consent to make a proposition which I think will obviate all difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The call of the roll must be completed.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names.

The CHAIRMAN. On the call of the roll one hundred and fifty-five members have answered.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask consent that the substitute as modified at the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be reported to the House, and that to-morrow, upon resuming the consideration of this bill, a yea-and-nay vote be taken on the substitute. If it be adopted, that will end the matter; if it be not adopted, then the House shall in Committee of the Whole resume the consideration of the majority bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The vote to be taken at what hour?

Mr. ELLIS. When we resume the consideration of this bill to-morrow. I would not want to interrupt the consideration of conference reports.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to yield any point of order there may be against the majority bill.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly not.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the proposition to the committee, as it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Is it in order, when it has been ascertained that there is no quorum present?

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent. Does the gentleman from Kentucky make the point that there is no quorum present?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I simply called the attention of the Chair to that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to the committee. It is that the substitute as modified and offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] be reported to the House, and that a yea-and-nay vote be taken thereon; if the substitute shall not be agreed to, then the House shall again go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection?

Mr. O'HARA. I desire to ask whether that arrangement includes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]?

Several MEMBERS. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. It does.

Mr. CALKINS. That is included.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposed arrangement? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

Mr. McCOMAS. I move that the House adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following business was transacted by unanimous consent:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

CATHARINE H. GLICK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 1, 1884.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return Senate bill 1971, granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias P. Glick, deceased, said bill having passed the Senate June 27, 1884.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with and this bill returned.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WARD, for to-morrow.

To Mr. NUTTING, for six days, on account of important business.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolutions of Post No. 59, Grand Army of the Republic, McKeesport, Pa., relative to pensions, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Memorial relating to the claim of Rebecca Wilber—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. S. S. COX: Memorial relative to the claim of Augustus P. Green—to the same committee.

Also, the memorial of the national convention of the chiefs and commissioners of State bureaus of statistics of labor—to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Memorial of the trustees of the College of Christian Brothers, Saint Louis, Mo., for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FOLLETT: Petition of Samuel E. Smith, administrator, for relief—to the same committee.

By Mr. HARDEMAN: Petitions of merchants, manufacturers, planters, and citizens of Columbus, Ga., favoring the passage of the McPherson Senate bill—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. JAMES: Petition of Rev. S. D. Burchard, D. D., and 13 others; of Rev. J. C. K. Millington, pastor, and the membership of the Reformed Presbyterian church; of Rev. L. W. Sampson, D. D., and 7 others of the Fifty-third Street People's church; of Rev. Norman Fox, pastor of Seaman's Baptist church, and the congregation, and of Rev. John Hall, D. D., pastor, and 1,500 members of the Presbyterian Church, New York city, relative to common schools, &c., for Indians—severally to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. LOVERING: Petitions of 703 posts, Grand Army of the Republic, asking for the passage of an act granting a pension of $8 per month to all officers, soldiers, and sailors who served sixty days or more during the war of the rebellion—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of 30,000 citizens and ex-soldiers not members of the Grand Army of the Republic, asking for the passage of House bill No. 6463 on the same subject—to the same committee.

By Mr. TALBOTT: Petition of John B. Fay, asking Congress to grant him one month's extra pay—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. WELLER: Petition of John H. Murtha and 43 others, for the reduction of the salaries of the President and other public officers, and to place lumber, salt, &c., on the free-list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 2, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. W. I. MCKENNEY, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature of the following enrolled bills which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman; and

A bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I present the conference report on the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 1, 1884.

Resolved, That the House further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. CALKINS be the managers of the said further conference on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the conferees will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WALDO HUTCHINS,
SAM J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. RANSOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are now in order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a petition of citizens of California, praying for the passage of House bill No. 100 for the relief of certain pre-emption and homestead settlers in California on what is called the Moquelamos grant. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I call the especial attention of that committee to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM presented the petition of E. S. Justh, of Washington, D. C., praying for the amendment of a bill entitled "An act relating to police regulations in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens and soldiers of Elizabeth, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation by Congress in accordance with the recommendations of the Grand Army of the Republic in relation to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Grocers and Importers' Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of House bill No. 2414, making bills of lading conclusive in certain cases; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the petition of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, of Washington, D. C., praying Congress to repeal the twenty-second section of the law for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses, which section provides for intermediate State enumerations, and for other purposes. While I have not carefully examined the petition, I think it is one of importance and perhaps contains useful information. I move, therefore, that it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. VANCE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4651) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes," to report it without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. VANCE. A word of explanation, I think, will remove any objection that could possibly be made to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the bill be read for information.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to explain it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will first be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VANCE. I think if I could be permitted to explain it, the Senator would withdraw his objection.

Mr. ALLISON. If there is no explanation made about it, and the bill goes right through, I shall not object.

Mr. VANCE. It is a House bill——

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not make any explanation. It is not necessary.

Mr. VANCE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5442) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to make a favorable report on the bill (H. R. 6409) to validate and cure defects in certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, and I ask that the bill be immediately considered.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the Senator from Iowa will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not debating the bill; I am simply appealing to the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is in the nature of debate.

Mr. ALLISON. If we are to pass the appropriation bills——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Debate is not in order. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to state that the Committee on the Judiciary reported adversely the bill (H. R. 7034) to increase the salary of the clerk of the Court of Alabama Claims, and the bill is now on the Calendar. I am authorized by the committee to say that they now recommend the passage of that bill with an amendment, and I had proposed to ask to take it up at the present time.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Iowa does not wish to have any interference with the appropriation bills——

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. HOAR. I have not made the request; I am merely stating why I should not make the request at present.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to anticipate a request of that sort, if necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. I hope my friend from South Carolina will vent his wrath on the right man and not on me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2297) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn., reported it with amendments.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson and Francis H. Ellison, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 387) for the relief of David Waldo & Co., submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 506) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala., and the children of Octavia Le Vert, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 768) for the relief of the National Bank of Western Arkansas, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1607) for the relief of the administrators of the estate of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 630) for the relief of Cora A. Slocumb, Ida A. Richardson, and Caroline A. Urquhart, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CONGER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back the bill (S. 1661) for the relief of George C. Tanner, United States consul at Liege, Belgium. The bill provides an appropriation of $200 to pay for the rent of a house, paid out by the consul, when the amount should have been paid by the United States. With the bill I report a letter from the Secretary of State recommending the payment by the Government. The committee recommend that the bill be placed as an amendment upon the sundry civil bill. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. CONGER. The chairman of the committee suggests that the bill and papers lie on the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and accompanying papers will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. CONGER. And given to the chairman at the proper time.

Mr. LAMAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 629) to attach the parishes of Saint Mary's and Iberia, in the State of Louisiana, to the western judicial district of Louisiana, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 91) prohibiting the Secretary of the Interior from certifying or patenting any lands to railroad corporations until Congress shall have acted upon any bill or report from committee declaring forfeiture of same, reported it with amendments.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LAPHAM, it was Ordered, That the papers in the pension claim of Isabella J. Ramsdell, now on file in the Secretary's office, be returned to the Committee on Pensions, there having been no adverse report.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIANS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate the facts relative to the condition of the Northern Cheyenne Indians on the Tongue and Rosebud Rivers who are alleged to be without rations and committing depredations upon settlers for subsistence.

TARIFF REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of Joseph Nimmo, jr., Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, on the operations of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, be printed; and that there be printed 6,500 additional copies, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Treasury Department.

MARIA G. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. LAPHAM. Monday I gave notice that at this hour I should ask to take up Order of Business 787, being a resolution to pay Maria G. Underwood $5,000 in full compensation for the time and expenses of her husband in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate, with a view of submitting some remarks upon the resolution. I stated at the same time that I would not ask to antagonize an appropriation bill. I state now that when the sundry civil appropriation bill is concluded, if there be time to-day, I shall ask that privilege, and if not I shall ask it to-morrow.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the custody of the Senate the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska. The bill was passed by the Senate yesterday with amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

CATHARINE H. GLICK.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, deceased.

Mr. VOORHEES. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa to allow me to have the pension bill which has just been returned from the House of Representatives postponed and the House bill pensioning the widow of Dr. Elias B. Glick taken up and passed. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I regret to be compelled to object, for the reason that the sundry civil bill must be finished to-day, and then there will be ample time, I will say to the Senator from Indiana, to pass all these other matters.

Mr. VOORHEES. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read for amendment at this time, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be first considered, and that they be considered as the reading proceeds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be read as in Committee of the Whole by paragraphs for amendment, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations as reported and others that they may propose as the bill goes on be considered in connection with the reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether that will permit amendments other than those offered by the committee before the reading of the bill is through?

Mr. ALLISON. It will not permit amendments unless they are offered as amendments to the committee amendments until after the reading of the bill is through. Then, of course, the whole bill will be open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa with reference to the reading of the bill and action on the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations? The Chair hears none. The reading will be proceeded with.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations "under the State Department," in line 11, after the word "State," to strike out "two" and insert "eight;" and after the words "eighteen hundred and," in line 15, to strike out "eighty-three" and insert "eighty-two;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of the international conference for fixing a common zero of longitude and standard of time reckoning, including cost of printing and translations, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $8,000; and the President is hereby authorized to appoint two delegates to represent the United States at said international conference, in addition to the number authorized by the act approved August 3, 1882, and who shall serve without compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 25 to 30, in the following words:

The commission may also conduct such special investigations, both at and subsequent to the international electrical exhibition, as may conduce to the progress of electrical science in this country, and may prepare and submit reports of the results of the conference and investigations.

So as to make the clause read:

That said commission may invite scientific men, native and foreign, to participate in the conference, and may, in general, determine the scope and character of its work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 31, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "ten," and in line 36, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

That the sum of $10,000 be appropriated to meet the expenses of the commission in conducting the conference and investigations and to meet the expenses of preparing reports of the same: Provided, That the whole amount of the expense incurred by said commission shall not exceed the said sum of $10,000; and the members of said commission shall not receive any compensation for services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 38, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to pay expenses already incurred for the Siamese embassy, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 41, to insert:

For payment, under the final award made by the late French and American Claims Commission against the United States, of the claims of French citizens against this Government, under the treaty of January 15, 1880, between this country and France, $625,566.35.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 48, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to obtain dies of the obverse and reverse of the seal of the United States, and the appliances necessary for making impressions from and for the preservation of the same, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 52, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to appoint from time to time, for such period as is absolutely necessary, medical inspectors to be attached to the United States consulates in countries where yellow fever, cholera, or plague exists in epidemic form, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 57, to insert:

That the sum of $559.11 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for contingent expenses for foreign missions, 1882, be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made available to pay the widow of General Judson Kilpatrick, late United States minister to Chili, the amount found due him on the settlement of his accounts for contingent expenses of the legation of the United States in Chili in 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 67 to 70, inclusive, as follows:

That the work of the commission shall be completed within three years after the passage of this act; and any balance remaining unexpended at the expiration of that time shall be covered into the United States Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "under the Treasury Department," "public buildings," in line 74, to increase the appropriation "for post-office and court-house at Baltimore, Md.: For continuation of building," from $100,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 80, after the word "for," to strike out "continuation" and insert "completion of building," and before the word "hundred" to strike out "one" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

For custom-house and post-office at Cincinnati, Ohio: For completion of building, $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 92, to increase the appropriation "for court-house and post-office at Columbus, Ohio: For continuation of building," from $50,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 102, to increase the appropriation "for court-house and post-office at Denver, Colo.: For continuation," from $50,000 to $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 105, to insert:

For custom-house and post-office at Dubuque, Iowa: For purchasing lot immediately north of the custom-house lot, Dubuque, Iowa, $5,000: Provided, That no part of the purchase money shall be paid until the Attorney-General of the United States shall be satisfied that there is a good title to said premises in the United States, free from all incumbrance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 112, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Fort Wayne, Ind.: For continuation of building, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 116, to increase the appropriation "for court-house and post-office at Galveston, Tex.: For continuation of building," from $25,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 117, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Harrisonburgh, Va.: For completion of building, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 131, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Lynchburg, Va.: For continuation of building, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 141, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the Attorney-General is hereby authorized and directed to bring suit for damages against said railway companies, if in his judgment a recovery can be had against them.

So as to make the clause read:

For custom-house, court-house, and post-office at Memphis, Tenn.: For completion of building and approaches, $50,000; and for the construction of a supporting wall for the custom-house lot at the city of Memphis, Tenn., where the same has been cut away along the river front thereof by certain railway companies, $50,000; in all, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 146, after the word "for," to insert "extension of site and;" so as to make the clause read:

For post-office at Minneapolis, Minn.: For extension of site and continuation, $70,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. I observe that the bill appropriates $70,000 for the post-office at Minneapolis, Minn., "for extension of site and continuation." The act providing for the erection of a public building at Minneapolis was approved on the 11th day of April, 1882. The amount which the site and building should cost is limited by the act to $175,000. What I wish to ask the chairman is whether in making these appropriations the committee limits itself to the amount limited in the act authorizing the construction of the building.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand this particular appropriation, the limit fixed for the cost of the building is $175,000. I think $100,000 has already been appropriated, certainly not more; so that the $70,000 appropriation is within the limits. But the Supervising Architect says that it is necessary to add about thirty feet of ground to the building, and we therefore inserted the words which are found in line 147.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 147, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Montgomery, Ala.: For completion of building and approaches and inclosing grounds with an iron fence, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 152, after the word "plumbing," to insert "including sewerage;" and in line 153, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty-seven;" so as to make the clause read:

For custom house at New Orleans, La.: For plumbing, including sewerage, and for completion of repairs, $47,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 153, to insert:

Court-house and post-office at New York city: That the sum of $16,104.4[illegible] being unexpended balances of appropriations made from time to time for a[illegible] ations and repairs, including approaches, to the court-house and pos[illegible] building at New York city, and for remedying defective ventilation, s[illegible] new elevators, and repairing old elevators, is hereby made availa[illegible] [illegible]pplying [illegible]e for such work of alterations and repairs as may be needed for the building proper and for the heating apparatus and elevators therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 163, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at New Haven, Conn.: For extension and repairs of building, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 166, to insert:

For public building at Norfolk, Va.: For introducing heating apparatus and improving grounds, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 185, to insert:

For the new custom-house at Saint Louis: For paving streets adjacent to the building, $9,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 190, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" and in line 192, after "New York," to strike out:

Provided, That the stone can there be procured as cheaply as elsewhere, all things being equal.

So as to make the clause read:

For post-office and court-house at Syracuse, N. Y.: For continuation of building, $75,000; stone used in the construction of said building to be procured from quarries in the State of New York.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 210, after the word "buildings," to strike out "including marine hospitals;" and in line 212, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For repairs and preservation of public buildings: Repairs and preservation of custom-houses, court-houses, post-offices, and other public buildings under control of Treasury Department, $175,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 212, to insert:

For repairs and preservation of marine hospitals, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 220, to insert:

For the repair of the United States mint building at Denver, Colo., $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 222, to insert:

For hydraulic passenger-elevator for building at corner of Seventeenth and F streets, known as Winder's building, $6,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 225, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ a suitable person to inspect all public buildings and examine into their requirements for furniture and other furnishings, including fuel, lights, and other current expenses, $3,000; and for necessary expenses, not exceeding $3,000; in all, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Light-houses, beacons, and fog-signals," after line 255, to insert:

For the purpose of erecting a light-house on the north end of Conanicut Island, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island, $18,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 262, to insert:

For lease of ground for electric light at Hell Gate, $400; and the Light-House Board is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to lease such parcel of land as is required for the establishment of said electric light at Hell Gate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 267, to insert:

For the establishment of lights on Hudson River, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 269, to insert:

For the establishment of lights on Cape Fear River, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 271, to insert:

For the establishment of lights on Saint John's River, Florida, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 280, to insert:

Croatan light station, North Carolina: For removing the Croatan light-house to a point where it will be of more value to navigators, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 294, to increase the appropriation for "Mosquito Inlet light station, Florida: For continuing the light-house at Mosquito Inlet, Florida" from $15,000 to $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 298, to increase the appropriation for "Rebecca Shoal light station, Florida: For completing the erection of a light-house on Rebecca Shoal, Florida Reefs, Florida" from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 304, to increase the appropriation for "Northwest Seal Rock light station, California: For continuing the construction of a light-house on the Northwest Seal Rock, off Point St. George, California," from $30,000 to $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 305, to insert:

Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory: For the establishment of a light at the entrance of Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory, $15,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 313.

Mr. CONGER. In line 310, I move to strike out "commencing" and insert "completing," and in line 311, to strike out "ten" before "thousand" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

For completing the construction of a light-house at or near Port Sanilac, Lake Huron, Michigan, $20,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not now in order. Under the order of the Senate, on the first reading through of the bill only the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations will be considered, after which the amendment will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I shall move the amendment subsequently.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 343, in the appropriations for "life-saving stations."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Iowa that after the word "one," in line 343, to make sense, the word "on" should be inserted and the word "on" before "one" changed to "of;" so as to read:

And of one on the coasts of Lakes Ontario and Erie, $1,800.

Mr. ALLISON. That should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Life-saving stations," in line 371, before "thousand," to strike out "eighty" and insert "eighty-seven;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and life-boat stations, during the period of actual employment; compensation of volunteers at life-saving and life-boat stations, for actual and deserving service rendered upon any occasion of disaster, at such rate, not to exceed $10 for each volunteer, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; pay of volunteer crews for drill and exercise; fuel for stations and houses of refuge; repairs and outfits for same; rebuilding and improvement of same; supplies and provisions for houses of refuge and for shipwrecked persons succored at stations; traveling expenses of officers under orders from the Treasury Department; for carrying out the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of the act approved May 4, 1882, and contingent expenses, including freight, storage, repairs to apparatus, medals, labor, stationery, advertising, and miscellaneous expenses that can not be included under any other head of life-saving stations on the coasts of the United States, $687,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Revenue-cutter service," in line 399, after "Richard Rush," to strike out "(and for the construction of the steam light-house tender herein provided for);" so as to read:

For rebuilding the revenue steamer Richard Rush, including a new hull, boiler, and outfits, but retaining the present engines, $80,000; and a sum not exceeding $10,000 to be obtained from sale of the old hull and materials: Provided, That the same shall be sold only after due appraisement and advertisement, and at a price not less than the appraised value. ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Iowa having charge of the bill to yield to me while I make a report from a conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). Will the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 35 to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the said amendment numbered 35.

P. B. PLUMB,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM H. FORNEY,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I move the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves the adoption of the report.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state for the information of the Senate that the House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendment. The Senate amended the Army bill by striking out so much of the bill as related to the prices paid for Army transportation. The conferees of the House have now agreed to recede from their disagreement to the Senate amendment, leaving the bill as it passed the Senate in that particular.

The report was concurred in.

REMOVAL OF CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion, which was passed yesterday morning. I desire it returned in order that I may ask the Senate to appoint a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, to request the return of the bill from the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Fisheries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Fisheries. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SLATER. I ask to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made excusing him from further service upon that committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Chair fill the vacancies upon the Committees on Fisheries and on Indian Affairs occasioned by the resignation of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] and myself this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of the gentlemen named on the Committees on Fisheries and Indian Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The Chair appoints to be a member of the Committee on Fisheries the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER], and upon the Committee on Indian Affairs the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Alaskan seal-fisheries," after line 921, to insert:

For the protection of sea-otter hunting-grounds and seal-fisheries in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to use revenue steamers for the protection of the interests of the Government on the seal-islands and the sea-otter hunting-grounds, and the enforcement of the provisions of law in Alaska, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 941 to 943, inclusive, as follows:

That all laws or parts of laws authorizing the appointment of a National Board of Health be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay and expenses of the members of the National Board of Health, $10,000.

For the investigation of questions affecting the public health, $8,000.

Mr. HARRIS I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill to strike out in the first paragraph "ten," in line 945, and insert "eight;" so as to read:

For pay and expenses of the members of the National Board of Health, $8,000.

And in line 947, to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

For the investigation of questions affecting the public health, $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS. It does not change the amount of the appropriation, but changes the items.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 947, to insert:

For rent, fuel, postage, telegraphing, printing, and all other miscellaneous expenses, $2,500.

For clerks and messenger, $4,500; amounting, in all, to $25,000.

The President of the United States is hereby authorized, in case of threatened or actual epidemic, to use the unexpended balance of appropriation made by act approved August 7, 1882, and act approved March 3, 1883, not to exceed $100,000, in aid of State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same and maintaining quarantine at points of danger.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 963 to 965, inclusive, as follows:

United States quarantine buildings, Marine Hospital Service: Gulf quarantine: For building wharf, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 979, to increase from $10,000 to $50,000 the appropriation "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to establish and maintain quarantine stations, and to provide proper shelter for and care of neat-cattle imported, at such ports as he may deem necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 970, to insert:

For amount necessary to pay direct-tax purchasers the amount paid by said purchasers for real estate sold under the direct-tax laws, and from which they have been evicted by judgment of a United States court, $2,414.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "United States Executive Departments at the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition at New Orleans, La.," in line 986, after "State Department," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" in line 987, after "Treasury Department," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" in line 988, after "Interior Department," to strike out "(not including the Bureau of Education);" in line 989, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" after the word "dollars," in the same line, to strike out "for the Bureau of Education, Interior Department, $40,000;" and in line 1000, after the word "dollars," to insert:

To be disbursed under the direction of the board on United States Executive Departments appointed under executive order of May 13, 1884; and no expenses of any kind beyond the amounts herein provided for shall be incurred by any of the said Departments, or any officer thereof, on account of said exposition.

So as to make the clause read:

To enable the several Executive Departments, the Department of Agriculture, and the Smithsonian Institution to participate in the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition to be held at New Orleans, La., under act of Congress of February 10, 1883, as follows: For the War Department, $80,000; for the Navy Department, $60,000; for the State Department, $20,000; for the Treasury Department, $15,000; for the Interior Department, $150,000; for the Post-Office Department, $10,000; for the Department of Agriculture, $40,000; for the Department of Justice, $3,000; for the Smithsonian Institution (including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries), $100,000; for necessary incidental expenses of administration by the board, including office-rent, fuel, gas, stationery, telegrams, and expressage, $22,000; in all, $500,000; to be disbursed under the direction of the board on United States Executive Departments appointed under executive order of May 13, 1884; and no expenses of any kind beyond the amounts herein provided for shall be incurred by any of the said Departments, or any officer thereof, on account of said exposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that the Committee on Appropriations instruct me—that is their last instruction—to move to strike out, from line 979 to 1005, all that provision and insert what I send to the Secretary's desk. I think the whole situation may as well be understood now. The proposition is to strike out the whole paragraph relating to this World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition and insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the amendments proposed by the committee to the paragraph from line 979 to 1005 inclusive by inserting in lieu of the whole paragraph an amendment which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, including the Department of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, to participate in the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition to be held at New Orleans, La., under act of Congress of February 10, 1883, to be expended under the direction of the President, $250,000.

Mr. BECK. I ask the chairman of the committee if he has any objection to allowing this amendment to be passed over until the other amendments of the committee are disposed of, to be considered as one of the committee amendments, but after the other amendments have been acted on? I will state my reason for the request. A great many gentlemen were induced to believe by the printed bill—the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor is one of them, who is now absent—that the amendment as printed in the bill would be the one the committee would adhere to. If the proposed amendment is read and the attention of the Senate called to it, I think there will be less trouble, and it will be fairer to allow it to be passed over until gentlemen objecting to the amendment have time to look at it.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to that if the Senator thinks gentlemen have been misled by this printed bill.

Mr. BECK. I think so. I believe it.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to passing it over for the time being, but I give notice now of the amendment as proposed by the committee and ask Senators to give their attention to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the question on the amendments from lines 979 and 1005 be passed over informally to be resumed at a later stage. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items "under the Navy Department," after line 1008, to insert:

For repairing the dry-dock at the Brooklyn, N. Y., navy-yard, $140,954.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1011, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to continue the improvement of the cob-dock at the navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by act of March 3, 1883, (22 Statutes, page 620), amounting to $47,362, is hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditures during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1022, to insert:

For the erection of a new derrick at the Mare Island navy-yard, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1024, to insert:

For Coasters' Harbor Island, Rhode Island: For completion of wharf, dredging, heating apparatus, water supply for drill-hall and training-ships, repairs to old building and main causeway, and for lighting thoroughfares, houses, and vessels at Coasters' Harbor Island, $41,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1030, to insert:

For incidental expenses of conducting a post-graduate school for naval officers, $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee instructs me to ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1032, to insert:

For the publication of information from abroad, Bureau of Navigation, $5,000

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1034, to insert:

For altering and refitting one of the Government buildings at the Norfolk navy-yard as a barrack for marines stationed there, $12,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendmendment was, after line 1038, to insert:

For completing the repairs to the Superintendent's house at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee instruct me to ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1041, to insert:

To pay the owners of the schooner Druid in full satisfaction of their claim for loss and damage to said vessel and cargo resulting from collision with the United States steamer Powhatan, on the 15th day of October, 1883, off the coast of Halifax, $11,201.43.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the chairman of the committee whether the claim has been ascertained in any way for the schooner Druid? Has the amount of this claim been in any way lawfully ascertained and the indebtedness of the Government for it established?

Mr. ALLISON. It has been ascertained by the usual method in similar cases—that is, a board of naval officers was designated to examine the schooner Druid and ascertain the damages and report upon them, and they have reported this amount.

Mr. MORGAN. Has it been audited and allowed by any Department?

Mr. INGALLS. Is not this a private claim? If so, I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas makes the point of order that this is a private claim. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad the Chair does; but I should like to have put on record the reasons for the proposition.

Mr. BECK. I should like to have the letter that the Senator from Iowa refers to read before the Chair decides the question. I do not think the Chair will hold that it is a private claim when he hears the communication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will reserve his decision until the letter is read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 25, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to present for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations the following facts:

On the 15th of October, 1883, a collision occurred at sea, off the coast of Halifax, between the schooner Druid, of and from Lunenburg, N. S., bound for a port in the West Indies, and the United States steamship Powhatan, bound for the port of Boston, Mass.

On the 23d of October a court of inquiry was ordered to investigate and report the circumstances attending the collision and where the blame, if any, should rest. On the 30th of November the court reported that the officer of the deck of the Powhatan, Lieut. Charles A. Stone, United States Navy, was responsible for the collision. On the 23d of November a general court-martial was ordered for the trial of Lieutenant Stone, and also of Capt. A. W. Johnson, the commanding officer of the Powhatan, upon a charge of culpable negligence and inefficiency in the performance of duty while navigating the Powhatan at the time of the collision.

Lieutenant Stone was tried first, found guilty of the charge, and sentenced to suspension from rank and duty for two years, on waiting-orders pay, and to be reprimanded in general orders by the Secretary of the Navy. Captain Johnson was next tried and acquitted, but the finding of "not guilty" in his case was disapproved.

On the 19th of December the owners of the Druid filed their claim for $11,519.88 as the aggregate amount of loss and damage to vessel and cargo resulting from the collision. On the 11th of January, 1884, a board of officers was duly appointed to examine the claim in detail, together with the proofs and vouchers connected therewith, which board, after such examination, reported a total allowance of $11,201.43 in favor of the claimants. Being satisfied that such allowance is just and proper, I have the honor to request that the amount in question be inserted in the sundry civil bill now pending in your committee.

Very respectfully,

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. WM. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is still of opinion that this is a private claim, and that on the principle of its not being such every claim sent to the Committee on Claims might be inserted in this bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BECK. I am not able to lay my hand on the papers, and I do not propose to dispute the decision; but this was a foreign ship and there was some arrangement between the Government of this country and the colonial government of Canada whereby this commission was had under the authority of the two countries; but that perhaps would not alter the case on the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will understand that there is nothing for the Chair to decide but that under the rules this is a private claim. The justice of it is quite a different question. The Chair thinks this is clearly a private claim in the form in which the proposition stands.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to add that we were so careful about inserting private claims that we looked into this and found that there were some negotiations between this Government and Canada relative to the action of the Secretary of the Navy and his officers; and we did not regard it on the papers as being a private claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks in the form in which it stands it is clearly a private claim.

Mr. HALE. It raises a question that ordinary claims do not, something of international comity, it being an outside matter entirely from a claim of one of our own citizens. That is, as the Senator from Kentucky says, the reason why the committee gave it a place on the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senate has refused to agree to the amendment contained in lines 1039, 1040, and 1041, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I was recently at Annapolis and I saw the house mentioned in this proposed amendment. It is partially completed; the walls are up and it is inclosed, and it would not require a great deal of money to complete it. I should like if the chairman of the committee would state why he recommended to the Senate to not agree to that proposed amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I stated that I was instructed by the committee to so recommend.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Why did the committee so instruct the Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the idea of the committee was that the expenditure, so far as made on this building, has been in violation of law, and they thought it hardly worth while now to authorize the completion of the building when the expenditure thus far made had been in violation of law. That is the reason the committee gave for its instruction to me.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the chairman state what statute has been violated in the erection?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is more familiar with the sublect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that there was a statute forbidding any of the appropriations made for the naval service being used for the repairs of the superintendent's house. The superintendent, as I understand it, instead of making repairs there, tore down the old building and constructed a new one without any authority of law. That is my understanding and reeollection. I have not the statute before me, or I should point the Senator to it.

Mr. HALE. I have looked into matters connected with the Navy Department. A general statute forbids the use of any appropriations for a distinctive purpose, for any other purpose. Under the statute and against its spirit and terms, the superintendent went on and under the head of "repairs," which was not intended to comprehend anything but repairs of old buildings and other buildings, took funds enough to practically build a new structure. The committee thought that it was done in defiance of law and admonished him by special clauses put upon the appropriation bills that it should not be done; but, all the same, the building went on and was almost completed. The committee was not willing, that having been done, that any further money should be appropriated, but preferred that it should stand as it is, I suppose, as a monument of the attitude of Congress on that position.

I will say that so far as I am concerned I am entirely willing the building should now be finished. I think it has stood there long enough and we had better finish it up and have it done with, but the committee has thought otherwise, and so I do not make any point.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think the Senator from Maine does complete justice in this case. The superintendent of the academy submitted an estimate to rebuild his headquarters. When that estimate came before the committee the committee, instead of making an appropriation to rebuild his headquarters, made an appropriation to repair the old headquarters. In the face of that appropriation and enactment he went on and tore down his old headquarters and took that money as far as it would go to tear them down and make the underpinning of new quarters. Then the next year he came for an appropriation to complete the erection of his new quarters, and Congress put in this provision:

For necessary repairs of public buildings, pavements, wharves, and walls inclosing the grounds of the Naval Academy, and for improvements, repairs, and furniture and fixtures, $21,000: Provided, That no appropriations provided for in this act shall be construed to authorize or be applied to a new building for the use of the superintendent or other officers of the academy.

Nevertheless he went on till he has the building erected and covered, in the face of this provision. Then there came in this bill this item for money to complete it, and the committee thought that on the whole it would be well enough to have it remain in its present position at least for a while in testimoniam rei.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It has remained in its present condition for nearly one year, and it seems to me it would be for the interest of the Government to go on and complete it now. A certain amount of money appropriated by Congress has gone into the erection of the building. It is of no use as it now is and all the money invested in it is a dead investment. Five thousand dollars, as I understand, will complete it. Then if the Committee on Appropriations are of the opinion that the superintendent ought not to be allowed to occupy it they can put cadets in it or they can put some inferior officer in it.

The investment already made, whether made strictly in accordance with law or not, can only be utilized by completing the building.

Mr. DAWES. Congress was of opinion that the old headquarters should not be taken down and new ones put in their place. It seemed to Congress to be a very valuable old building. It was built before the Revolutionary war, and was a relic which seemed to Congress of great value. It seemed to the superintendent, however, not to be of much value. He differed from Congress, and he tore it down in violation of an express enactment, and he has resolved that he will have his quarters new instead of this venerable old edifice.

There is one more such edifice left there which was occupied by the governor of the province before the Revolution. Those who saw this building, who were outside of the Naval Academy, seemed to think and enacted that it should not go down.

Now, I do not care anything about it. If Congress does not care about having its enactments regarded by the officers, I am but one member of Congress and I shall try and reconcile myself to it. So far as I am concerned, for one, whenever Congress declares that a thing shall be done and an official says it shall not be done, I am not one of those who will say, "Well, it is done and we will accept it and make the best of it;" I am not one of that kind.

Mr. MORRILL. May I inquire of the Senator if this was done in defiance of law how was it possible that the accounts came to be audited by the Treasury?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know anything about that. I did not audit the accounts; I read the law.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, there is no doubt that the law has been violated in this case; but there is a question now of how far we are going to punish this superintendent. The method adopted in this bill is the punishment of the United States instead of the punishment of the superintendent. He has a good house to live in, which he is now occupying; and it does not matter to him whether this building is completed or not; but it stands there partially completed; it is covered, but without windows, and subject to deterioration from the elements. The question is whether we shall go on and complete it and have it ready for the occupancy of somebody.

I do not think it is wise to let the building go to decay. What has been done has been done; you can not undo it at this time; and you are only punishing the people of the United States by such enactments as this refusing to appropriate the requisite money to go on and finish the building. If any officer of the Navy Department, whether the superintendent or any other officer, has violated an act of Congress, there is some way to get at him besides refusing to do a thing which ought to be done for the best interests of the United States in respect to this building. That is my view of it; and I hope the amendment of the committee striking out the clause will not be agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The committee proposed the amendment, and I think the question has been already taken; but I have no doubt the chairman will consent that it be taken again.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Whatever is necessary to be done to have the building completed should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to adopt the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I hope there will be unanimous consent to put the question over again. A discussion grew up and the matter was merely put formally by the Chair, nobody attending to what was going on, and the debate happened after the vote. I hope by unanimous consent the question will be put again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the question being again taken on agreeing to the amendment on lines 1039, 1040, and 1041? The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment inserting those lines.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not very often we get as plain a case as this where we can assert what little is left of the legislative authority of this Government. We have the least possible control over the money we vote here. We vote sums of money to our Executive Departments, and say by positive laws that they shall not spend any more than we vote, and they go right on and spend in such a way that we have to make appropriations of seven, ten, or even twenty-five millions a year to make up the deficiencies they themselves create in violation of law. It may be, perhaps, that this is not the most wholesome point at which we can assert our authority, but it is a very good one, I think, because there can be no more flagrant violation of the law, no more flagrant contempt of Congress, no more flagrant assertion of the power of a naval officer to have things his own way, irrespective of written statutes, than is presented here.

I submit that if we are to have any legislative independence whatever, if we are to assert the power of the law over the creatures of the law and over the control of the expenditure of the public money, we can afford at least to pause long enough to make an example of this kind, however trivial it may be, because after all to a certain extent it is going to be conspicuous, because the violation of the law has been of the most conspicuous possible character; and we can afford to do that in this case because it does not involve anything of importance to any Department of the Government. It is simply a question as to whether there shall be so many rooms more or less at the Annapolis Academy during the next fiscal year. If it were going to arrest any of the great functions of the Government, if it were going to stop some bureau of the Treasury Department or some other Department of the Government in the discharge of its duties in such a way as to cause difficulty, I would say we had better pocket this as we have pocketed all the other things of which I have spoken and with which we are constantly confronted in our relations with the Executive Departments.

But here is a case where an officer came before the Appropriations Committee and sought to have an appropriation made for the purpose of erecting a building, and he was told then and there, in the first place, that it was not the purpose of Congress to have a new building but to repair the old building and keep it; and in the next place that it was deemed proper to keep that particular building, as it was an old building and the only one practically there was about the academy that it was thought well to retain, a building connected with the present and the far past. Thereupon an appropriation was made to repair that old building; and in direct defiance of the terms of the law and of the admonition of the committee in response to his importunities for appropriations, he tore down the old building which it was designed to have remain there, and constructed the foundation of a new one, and then came in and asked for an appropriation to complete that building. Congress then, after debate in the Senate, enacted that there should be no reconstruction of that old building, but that its bricks and foundation should stay there as a monument of the displeasure of Congress with this violent and wholly inexcusable act on the part of this executive officer. But he simply laughed at the enactment, as he had done before, I have no doubt, but as officers do every day of the year, and took the money we said he should not use for that purpose and proceeded to use it for that purpose.

Now, the Senator from Vermont asks how did these accounts escape the scrutiny of the Treasury Department. I answer by saying that the Treasury Department does not scrutinize these accounts. The Treasury Department practically does not scrutinize the accounts of either the Army or the Navy. These accounts are paid by the Pay Department of the Navy, and the only scrutiny which practically the Treasury exercises over accounts of the Pay Department is to see that the sums total are correct. Scrutiny is applied to the statements of the accounts of the Indian Bureau and the Land Office and things of that kind, but practically the Army and Navy get the sums of money we give them and they spend them in their own way. An illustration of that has been furnished by some peculations which have turned up in the Navy Department, showing with what utter lack of scrutiny accounts are passed in that Department. I do not speak of it particularly as characterizing that Department as against other Departments, but as simply a naked fact.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield to me.

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. For information I wish to know if the officer in this case exceeded in expenditure the amount of the appropriation for this work?

Mr. PLUMB. There was no appropriation made for the work. It was expressly stated that it should not be expended for this work; but notwithstanding that provision the money was taken and was expended. The total amount expended did not exceed the total amount appropriated by the bill; but there was just as plain a provision of the statute as could be put into language that no part of the money should be taken to complete that building, and yet it was taken and the money used as far as it would go toward the completion of the building which Congress said should not be built out of that money. That is the way the thing stands to-day. The Senator from Wisconsin says, and the Senator from California says, that while the law has been violated by this particular man, who is there now seeking the comforts and conveniences of this building, we might as well let it go and complete the building. I do not look at it in that way. If we do that thing now we might as well advertise at once that notwithstanding the limitations we put in the statute the money may be spent according to the sweet will of the executive officer who happens to get his hand upon it. If I had it to do, I would never complete that building. I would let it stay there as long as Annapolis remains, as a monument of the displeasure of Congress at the action of the executive officer in violating the law in two open cases in regard to one subject-matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to insert what will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For completing the repairs to the superintendent's house at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, $5,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope it will not be.

Mr. PLUMB. In the first place the committee do not report it. It went to the committee, but the committee itself in full session struck it out, and therefore it is not a committee amendment.

Mr. BECK. It is not a committee amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Here is the bill reported by the committee, and it is in that.

Mr. BECK. But the committee does like every other committee—meets and revises its action.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It did not meet and revise its action in this case, so far as I know, until after this bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. It met this morning and struck out this clause.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill was reported last evening, printed, and placed on our desks.

Mr. BECK. There need not be any dispute about the fact. That is so, but the committee met this morning and reversed the former action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to know, then, who moves this amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an amendment of the committee that was reported, but on reconsideration they think it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. I stated that the committee instructed me this morning to ask the Senate to reject the amendment, and I so asked the Senate to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on adopting this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1048, to insert:

For mileage of officers of the Navy, being for payment of accounts audited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, $29,357.75.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1054, to increase the appropriation "for navy-yards and stations" from $125,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1055 to 1062, inclusive, as follows:

Naval Observatory:

To enable the President to appoint a scientific commission, composed of scientific men, to inquire into the organization, work, expenses, and reconstruction of the Naval Observatory, and to report to Congress the best system for its future management, $700, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "under the Interior Department," to strike out from line 1064 to 1066, inclusive, as follows:

To complete the improvement of the Hot Springs Creek, in the town of Hot Springs, Ark., $75,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that when the committee first examined this question they could find no papers relating to this matter, but since that we have fully examined the case and find from the report made to the House and also from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior that this sum is necessary. Therefore I hope the amendment of the committee will be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1066, to insert:

Bureau of Labor:

For salary of Commissioner of Labor, $3,000; salary of chief clerk, $2,000; rent of rooms for use of bureau, and for fuel, light, and stationery, $3,000; and for other necessary expenses of said bureau, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and as provided by law, $17,000; in all, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1099, to insert:

For constructing terraces north and south of the Capitol, sections marked A and M, as shown on printed plan accompanying the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury (Executive Document No. 9, first session Forty-eighth Congress), $115,000, including wages of mechanics and laborers: Provided, That the work under this appropriation shall be confined to the north and south fronts of the Capitol building, and shall not extend westward beyond the line of the west fronts of the Senate and House wings of the Capitol.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1112, after the word "gas," to insert "electric lighting;" so as to make the clause read:

For lighting the Capitol and grounds: For lighting the Capitol and grounds about the same, including the Botanic Garden and Senate and House stables: For gas, electric lighting, pay of superintendent of meters, lamp-lighters, gas-fitters, and for materials for gas or electric lighting, and for general repairs, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1121, to insert:

New Pension building: For completion of the new Pension building, as per estimate contained in Senate Executive Document No. 188, present session, $266,559.62.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 1147.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, in line 1145, to strike out "Minnesota and," before "Dakota," and in line 1147, after the word "thousand," I move to strike out "five hundred;" so as to read:

For contingent expenses of the office of the surveyor-general of Dakota: For rent of office for the surveyor-general, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After line 1147, I move to insert:

Office of surveyor-general of Minnesota: For contingent expenses of the office of the surveyor-general of Minnesota, for fuel, books, stationery, pay of messenger, and other incidental expenses, $1,000.

These are all amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Ought that not to be $2,000?

Mr. ALLISON. One thousand dollars was the appropriation last year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Expenses of the collection of revenue from sales of public lands," in line 1210, to increase the appropriation "for incidental expenses of the several land offices" from $140,000 to $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1212, to increase the appropriation "for expenses of depositing money received from the sale of public lands" from $12,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1219, after the word "lands," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-five;" and, in line 1220, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That agents and others employed under the three preceding paragraphs, while traveling on duty shall be allowed per diem in lieu of subsistence at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation.

So as to make the clause read:

For expenses of agents employed in adjusting for swamp lands and for indemnity for swamp lands, $25,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under the three preceding paragraphs while traveling on duty shall be allowed per diem in lieu of subsistence at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1230, to insert:

To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to prepare and publish a new map of the United States, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Surveying the public lands," in line 1235, after the word "lands," to strike out "three hundred" and insert "four hundred and fifty thousand;" so as to read:

For surveying the public lands, $450,000, at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander miles, $7 for township, and $5 for section lines, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to print extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1884.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion; and

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House bill 4696.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives which has been returned at the request of the Senate. The title of the bill will be reported.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the amendments of the the Senate to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HARRISON, Mr. MILLER of California, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

REMOVAL OF CHARGE OF DESERTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the other House bill which has been returned at the request of the Senate.

The Secretary read the title of the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill last reported.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. SEWELL were appointed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1284.

Mr. ALLISON. At the end of line 1284 I move to add:

Provided, That all appropriations herein under public lands shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "therein," in line 1295, to strike out "the balance of the sum appropriated to" and insert "Provided, That of the foregoing sum $27,000 shall;" so as to make the clause read:

For the protection and improvement of the Yellowstone National Park: For every purpose and object necessary for the protection, preservation, and improvement of the Yellowstone National Park, including compensation of superintendent and employés, $40,000, $2,000 of said amount to be paid annually to a superintendent of said park, and not exceeding $900 annually to each ten assistants, all of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and reside continuously in the park, and whose duty it shall be to protect the game, timber, and objects of interest therein: Provided, That of the foregoing sum $27,000 shall be expended in the construction and improvement of suitable roads and bridges within said park, under the supervision and direction of an engineer officer detailed by the Secretary of War for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1301, to insert:

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

For this amount, to pay the Creek Nation of Indians for 151,870.48 acres of land, being the amount taken by the United States in excess of the estimate made in the third article of the treaty with said Indians proclaimed August 11, 1866, at 30 cents per acre, with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the proclamation of said treaty, $86,313.04.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1312, to insert.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to appoint and pay the expenses of a commission of three persons to examine and report what changes should be made in the boundary lines of Indian reservations and the location of Indian agencies in Northern Montana, and to confer with the Crows in reference to a reduction of their reservation, and also to report, upon examination, what changes are necessary in the location of the Rosebud, Lower Brulé, and Cheyenne River agencies, in Dakota Territory, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1323, to insert:

To pay amount found due N. C. Smith, as per certificate of Second Comptroller numbered 1848, dated June 9, 1884, under appropriation made by the act of August 15, 1876, for "payment of indebtedness incurred by Silas H. Sweetland," $100.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 1324, I move to strike out "C" and insert "J;" so as to read:

To pay amount found due N. J. Smith, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "United States Geological Survey," after the word "States," in line 1336, to strike out "for furnishing points for State surveys; and to continue the collection of statistics of mines and mining;" in line 1341, after "Interior," to strike out "four hundred" and insert "three hundred and eighty-four;" and in line 1343, after the words "by the," to strike out "Director" and insert "Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the clause read:

For the United States Geological Survey: For the Geological Survey, and the classification of the public lands, and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, and to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States; including the pay of temporary employés in the field and office, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $384,000. And the scientific employés of the Geological Survey shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior exclusively for their qualifications as professional experts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1365 and 1366, as follows:

For salary of one general assistant, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1368, to reduce the total amount of the appropriations for the "United States Geological Survey" from $67,700 to $64,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Tenth Census," in line 1372, after the word "on," to strike out "November 1, 1884," and insert "June 30, 1885;" and in line 1374, after the word "employés," to strike out "ten" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For the work of taking the Tenth Census and closing the bureau on June 30, 1885, including the salary of the superintendent and of all clerks and other employés, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1375, to insert:

And in addition to the number of printed copies of the reports of the tenth census authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the tenth census," approved August 7, 1882, there shall be printed 25,000 copies of the Compendium of the Tenth Census, of which 8,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 16,000 copies for the use of the House, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior; and there shall also be printed and separately bound in paper covers an edition of each of the following-named monograph reports, the number of copies of each edition to be as follows, namely: Of the reports on the seal islands of Alaska, on ship-building, on the cereals, on the manufacture of glass, on the resources of Alaska, on tobacco culture, on the factory system, on wages paid in manufacturing industries, 3,000 copies each; of the reports on the newspapers and publishing interests, on silk manufacture, on chemical products and salt, on flour-milling, on meat production, on the production of petroleum, on the manufacture of coke, on the manufacture of tobacco, on the manufacture of shop-tools, 2,500 copies each; of the report on cotton culture in the United States, including reports on cotton fiber and cotton-seed oil, 3,000 copies; of the report on cotton culture in Louisiana, in Mississippi, in Tennessee, and Kentucky, in Missouri, in Arkansas, in Texas, in Alabama, in Georgia, in North Carolina, in South Carolina, in Virginia, in California, and in the Indian Territory, 2,000 copies each: Provided, That of the above-named separate editions one-fourth shall be for the use of the Senate, one-half for the use of the House, and one-fourth for the use of the Census Office: Provided also, That the copies of the compendium and monograph reports herein provided for shall be distributed through the Interior Department according to the provisions of existing law: Provided further, That the changes or corrections necessitated by errata in former editions of the reports herein referred to shall first be made by the Superintendent of Census; and the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to defray the expenses of printing and binding the publications herein provided for, shall be paid out of the appropriation made by the act of August 7, 1882, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the tenth census."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "miscellaneous objects," in the appropriations for the "Government Hospital for the Insane," after line 1436, to insert:

And in addition to the persons now entitled to admission to the Government Hospital for the Insane, any inmate of the Soldiers' Home who is now or may hereafter become insane shall, upon an order of the president of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home, be admitted to said hospital and treated therein; and if any inmate so admitted from said home is or thereafter becomes a pensioner, and has neither wife, minor child, nor parent dependent on him, in whole or in part, for support, his arrears of pension and his pension-money accruing during the period he shall remain in said hospital shall be applied to his support in said hospital, and be paid over to the proper officer of said institution for the general uses thereof; and the expenses of maintaining any such person shall be paid from the Soldiers' Home fund.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out from the word "therein," in line 1442, down to and including "thereof," in line 1450, in the following words:

And if any inmate so admitted from said home is or thereafter becomes a pensioner, and has neither wife, minor child, nor parent dependent on him, in whole or in part, for support, his arrears of pension and his pension-money accruing during the period he shall remain in said hospital shall be applied to his support in said hospital, and be paid over to the proper officer of said institution for the general uses thereof.

This provision undertakes to take from the soldier, while he is being treated for a mental malady, not only his pension during that time but any arrears of pension. The law regulating the Soldier's Home passed at the last Congress provides that his pension shall be paid to him while in the home, in such amounts as the managers of the home think consistent with good order and discipline, and the remainder is paid over to him when he leaves, or to his heirs in case of death. I can see no reason why, if he is sent to a Government hospital, his pension should then be taken from him. It seems to me that including the provision that the expenses of his maintenance shall be paid from the Soldier's Home fund is all that is needed, especially in view of the fact that they have a very large fund, and these old soldiers who are there have contributed to the fund themselves by a tax assessed upon their pay during their whole term of service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1456, to insert:

For building one wooden cottage at the cemetery, $800.

For subsistence, $22,000; for salaries and compensation of the surgeon-in-chief, two assistant surgeons, engineer, clerk, matron, nurses, laundresses and cooks, teamsters, watchmen, and laborers, $14,000, of which sum $3,500 shall be paid as salary to the surgeon-in-chief; for rent of hospital buildings and grounds, $4,000; for fuel and light, clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, medicines and medical supplies, repairs and furniture, and other absolutely necessary expenses, $11,000; in all, $51,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1498, to insert:

For building four bath-rooms and water-closets, relaying floors, and repairing porches, $1,500; the same to be paid from any unexpended balances of appropriations for the said hospital for the fiscal year 1884.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "National Museum," in line 1510, before the word "thousand" to strike out "ninety-one" and insert "ninety-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For the preservation of collections of the National Museum: For the preservation and exhibition and increase of the collections received from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, and other sources, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employés, $95,000. And the director of the National Museum is hereby directed to report annually to Congress the progress of the museum during the year and its present condition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1529, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For furniture and fixtures of the National Museum: For cases, furniture, and fixtures required for the exhibition of the collections of the United States National Museum, and for salaries or compensation of all necessary employés, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Smithsonian Institution," after the word "stories," at the end of line 1537, to insert "including liabilities already incurred;" so as to make the clause read:

For finishing, heating, gas-fitting, plumbing, and completely furnishing the eastern portion of the Smithsonian Institution, and for finishing the fourth and fifth stories, including liabilities already incurred, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 35 to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "armories and arsenals" under the War Department, in line 1562, before the word "thousand" to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-six;" so as to make the clause read:

For general care, preservation, and improvement; for building new roads; for care and preservation of the water-power; for painting and care and preservation of permanent buildings, bridges, and shores of the island; for building fences, grading grounds, and repairs and extension of railroad, $26,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1564, to insert:

To further deepen the water-power canal at Rock Island arsenal, $28,800: Provided, That before said sum shall be expended the Moline Water-Power Company shall bind itself, upon the expenditure thereof for the purpose aforesaid, to release and discharge the United States from all further liability or obligation under the contract between said company and the Secretary of War of August 28, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1585.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Iowa that after the word "vicinity," in line 1584, the word "of" should be inserted, so as to read "in vicinity of officers' quarters."

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; that correction should be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 1617 to 1625, inclusive, as follows:

That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to sell at public auction, after due advertisement, and at prices not less than those fixed by a board of appraisers in each case, the following arsenals, to wit: Allegheny arsenal, Pennsylvania; Augusta arsenal, Georgia; Indianapolis arsenal, Indiana; Kennebec arsenal, Maine, and Watertown arsenal, Massachusetts; and the money so received, after paying necessary expenses, to be covered into the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Buildings and grounds in and around Washington," after the word "dollars," in line 1629, to insert:

Said site to be selected by and said pedestal to be erected under the supervision of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the chairman of the Garfield monumental committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland.

So as to make the clause read:

For the preparation of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a statue of the late President James A. Garfield, $30,000; said site to be selected by and said pedestal to be erected under the supervision of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the chairman of the Garfield monumental committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1634, to insert:

To defray the expenses attending the unveiling of the statue of the late Rear-Admiral Du Pont, to be erected in Du Pont Circle, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, $500, or so much thereof as may be required, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1644, to increase the appropriation "for improving, care, and maintenance of grounds south of the Executive Mansion" from $3,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1678, to increase the appropriation "for improving, care, and maintenance of various reservations" from $5,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1684, after the words "repair of," to insert "and refurnishing;" and in line 1685, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For care and repair of and refurnishing the Executive Mansion, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "military posts," in line 1722, after the words "enlargement of," to strike out "military posts at San Antonio, Fort D. A. Russell, Fort Niobrara, Atlanta (Ga.), Fort Snelling, and at;" in line 1724, after the word "such," to strike out "other;" and in line 1725, after the word "hundred," to strike out "and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For the construction of buildings at and the enlargement of such military posts as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary, $200,000.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the careful attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to what I shall say in regard to this amendment. I have no objection whatever to striking out the military posts at San Antonio, Fort D. A. Russell, Fort Niobrara, Atlanta, Fort Snelling, and so on, but in line 1929 the sum allowed by the House, $250,000, is reduced to $200,000. At the request of General Sheridan I visited his office, and went with him through some of the proposed improvements of those posts. I know personally that the policy which General Sheridan proposes to pursue in enlarging the posts at railroad centers and drawing in the smaller posts is economical. To do that the amount appropriated by the House is required. Indeed I know that a larger amount than $250,000 was thought to be proper. But I make no point on that. All I ask is that $250,000 shall be appropriated. About the post at Atlanta, Ga., I know nothing, but I am willing to let the General of the Army take the amount of $250,000 and put that amount down wherever he thinks it is to the best interest of the country to expend it. My opinion is that every dollar of it could be successfully put down, without saying a word against Atlanta, upon the frontier posts.

In view of the recommendations of the General of the Army and the investigation which I made carefully with him—and I think I know something about these things—I ask that the amount given by the House, $250,000, shall remain in the bill, and that the Senate non-concur with the recommendation of the committee in reducing the amount.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee why it was that the names of the different posts were stricken out of the bill by the committee?

Mr. ALLISON. Last year we appropriated, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for the posts most needing the expenditure. We found that the policy worked very well, and we concluded to adopt it in this particular appropriation bill.

Mr. BROWN. Why is the amount reduced $50,000? Does the Secretary of War say to the committee that he can get along properly with $200,000?

Mr. ALLISON. We appropriated last year $200,000, and we heard of no complaint with reference to it. There are very large appropriations relating to these posts for barracks and quarters in the Army bill, amounting to nearly a million dollars, and we thought that for the class of permanent improvements that is usually included in this appropriation $200,000 would be ample. Indeed, some of the members of the committee thought $150,000 would be ample.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will permit me, I know that since last year the architect of the War Department has brought in his plans for the improvement of various posts. It was only a short time ago that General Sheridan called upon me to come up and examine them. Those plans were not before the committee the last time. I think the $250,000 appropriated by the House is right.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to ask the chairman whether the committee conferred with the General of the Army or the Secretary of War on the subject of reducing the amount.

Mr. ALLISON. We did not confer in the sense that the Senator from Georgia would expect us to do so. We examined every paper connected with the matter of these posts, the letters of the Secretary of War and the letter of the General of the Army. Of course, if we followed out the recommendations of the General of the Army and the Secretary of War we should appropriate a very large sum for the Army. They submit every year very large estimates for appropriations for this purpose. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives hitherto have endeavored to keep down this class of appropriations to the absolute needs of the service. I think there will be no trouble about it.

I think I see the trouble in the mind of the Senator from Georgia. He dislikes of course to have Atlanta, Ga., stricken out of the bill; but the committee thought there was no special necessity at this time for enlarging upon the present requirements of the service in that direction. That was our idea.

Mr. MAXEY. I make no point on the first amendment striking out the names, but I should like to have the vote so divided that a separate vote shall be taken upon the two propositions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken upon each amendment separately.

Mr. BROWN. The only reason why I was unwilling to see Atlanta, Ga., stricken out is that the late General of the Army, General Sherman, after having gone through this whole matter very carefully, recommended at the last Congress—and he was very open in his statements—that there be an appropriation made to locate barracks at Atlanta, Ga., because, he said, it was the strategic point of the whole South, and was a very healthy location for troops in summer; that, everything considered, they could be thrown from that point to any point in the Southern States or along the coast more rapidly and with better railroad facilities than any other point. On account of the railroad connections of that city with all the Southern coast and on account of the great healthfulness of the climate he very strongly advocated that course.

However, if the appropriation is large enough to cover the actual necessities of the service, I think we can very well risk that matter on the position Atlanta occupies, and I believe she will get what is right from the present General of the Army and Secretary of War; but I should oppose the reduction of the amount. In other words, I shall vote with the Senator from Texas against reducing the appropriation from $250,000 to $200,000

Mr. PLUMB. There is an item in the regular Army appropriation bill for this same general purpose of about $900,000; I think exactly $900,000. That, added to the amount which the committee propose, makes $1,100,000 for the purpose of barracks and quarters and the enlargement of military posts, &c., which is a very large appropriation for a single year, and the committee thought it was enough.

A somewhat extended illustration of the vice of dividing up appropriations is furnished by this very item. We appropriate what seems to be a small sum for a purpose of this kind, $200,000, oblivious to the fact that a very much larger sum has been appropriated in another place.

By striking out the names of the posts the Secretary of War is invested with the full discretion to put the money which is to be appropriated, whatever the sum may be, where he thinks it will best answer the needs of the public service. That seemed to be wiser than naming the number of posts, and thereby seem to discriminate perhaps against other posts, and thus compel him to make allotments for these various posts notwithstanding they might be of greatly differing need. Possibly at the moment when the money came to be spent there would be no need at all, because, as it happens very often, posts are abandoned, or by reason of some shifting of Indian tribes or something of that kind the necessity for keeping a large garrison at a post entirely disappears. It is the vice of our appropriations for this purpose that we have spent large sums of money in places where there was no reasonable presumption that the posts would be continued, or at all events that they would continue to be of pressing importance. Take Atlanta or take San Antonio, those two places will remain undoubtedly depots of supplies by reason of their central location, and no doubt the Secretary of War will have that in mind in making allotments of funds for those particular posts.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I have made no point on that. I am perfectly willing to risk the General of the Army putting the money at those posts which are best.

Mr. PLUMB. I was not making my speech for the benefit of the Senator from Texas; I was speaking for the benefit of other people who had not got that far along. I think that $200,000 for the next year with an economical expenditure would be far better than $250,000 in the terms in which the bill came from the House; and I believe that there will be a fuller recognition for all purposes of San Antonio and of Atlanta, Ga., if the appropriation shall remain as recommended by the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I know how hard it is to fight the committee or to prevent an amendment recommended by the committee in any bill where the committee reduces the amount of the appropriation. I trust, however, that this amendment will not be agreed to. I do not care to argue the question further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Secretary will report the pending question.

The SECRETARY. In line 1722, after the word "of," the committee report to strike out "military posts at San Antonio, Fort D. A. Russell, Fort Niobrara, Atlanta (Ga.), Fort Snelling, and at."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the amendment?

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In line 1724, after the word "such," the committee report to strike out "other;" so as to read:

Such military posts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment in the paragraph will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In line 1725, before the word "thousand," the committee report to strike out "and fifty;" so as to read "$200,000."

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 22, noes not counted.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1726, to insert:

For the addition of two stories to the public building for a quartermaster and commissary depot in process of construction at Saint Paul, Minn., to be used as offices for officers of the Department of Dakota, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Signal Service," in line 1748, after the words "general service," to insert "connected therewith;" in line 1749, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "fifteen;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "Provided, That such connections, in the opinion of the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service and the Light-House Board, shall be deemed necessary;" and in line 1761, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-one" and insert "fifty-one;" so as to make the clause read:

For the observation and report of storms: For expenses of the meteorological observation and report of storms by telegraph and signal or otherwise announcing the probable approach and force of storms, for the benefit of commerce and agriculture throughout the United States; for manufacture, purchase, and repair of instruments, $5,500; for telegraphing reports, $136,000; for expenses of storm, cautionary, off-shore, and other signals on the sea and lake coasts of the United States, announcing the probable approach and force of storms, $10,000; for cotton-belt reports, $7,000; for continuing the connections of stations at life-saving stations and light-houses, including services of operators, repairmen, materials, and general service connected therewith, $15,500: Provided, That such connections, in the opinion of the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service and the Light-House Board, shall be deemed necessary; for manufacture, purchase, and repair of instrument-shelters, $2,000; for rent, hire of civilian employés, furniture, and other expenses of offices maintained for public use in cities and ports receiving reports outside of Washington, D. C., $40,000; for river and flood reports, $10,000; maps and bulletins to be displayed in chambers of commerce and boards of trade rooms, and for distribution, $25,000; in all $251,000: Provided, That the work of no other Department, bureau, or commission authorized by law shall be duplicated by this bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1765, to reduce the appropriation "for maintenance and repair of military telegraph lines" from $34,000 to $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1765, to insert:

For the establishment of signal stations upon the island of Nantucket, and of submarine telegraphic communication from such stations to the mainland, $40,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1777, after the word "dollars," to insert "one commissary sergeant, $408, and one hospital steward, $360, to be detailed from the Army;" in line 1786, after the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and fifty-eight" and insert "nine hundred and twenty-six;" in line 1790, after the word "exceed," to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" and after the word "law," at the end of line 1791, to insert "and of the three officers serving in the Arctic seas;" so as to make the clause read:

Pay: For pay of one brigadier-general and fourteen second lieutenants, $26,500; for longevity pay to officers, to be paid with current monthly pay, $4,000; for pay of one hundred and fifty sergeants, thirty corporals and three hundred and twenty privates, including payment due on discharge, $200,000; one commissary sergeant, $408, and one hospital steward $360, to be detailed from the Army; for mileage to officers when traveling on duty under orders, $5,000; cost of telegrams in regard to discharged men, $250; for pay of contract surgeon, $1,200; for commutation of quarters to commissioned officers at places where there are no public quarters, $8,208; in all $245,926. And the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to detail for the service in the Signal Corps not to exceed eight commissioned officers, exclusive of the second lieutenants of the Signal Corps authorized by law and of the three officers serving in the Arctic seas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1812, before the word "horses," to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" in the same line, after the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "three;" in line 1813, before the word "animals," to strike out "thirty-one" and insert "thirty-three;" in line 1817, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "thirty-one;" and in line 1824, after the word "thousand," to strike out "six hundred and fifty-one" and insert "eight hundred and sixty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Subsistence: For the subsistence of Signal Service enlisted men, and for commutation of rations of Signal Service enlisted men, including $9,090.90 for subsistence stores, authorized articles for sales to officers and enlisted men and company messes, as allowed by paragraph 2199, Army Regulations, 1881, $155,000.

Regular supplies: Fuel, authorized allowance for officers and enlisted men at Fort Myer, Virginia, and for various offices at Fort Myer, Virginia, and on the United States military telegraph lines, $6,200; commutation of fuel for two hundred and twenty enlisted men of the Signal Corps, at $9 each per month, $23,760; commutation of fuel for two hundred and forty-three enlisted men of the Signal Corps, at $8 each per month, $23,328; forage for twenty-five mules and eight horses, $3,300; straw for thirty-three animals, at $7 each per annum, as allowed by paragraph 1898, Army Regulations, 1881, $231; straw for forty enlisted men at post of Fort Myer, Virginia, and for hospital at that post, as allowed by paragraph 1896, Army Regulations, 1881, $46.08; stationery, $100; stoves and repairs to heating apparatus, $600; lights, $300; in all, $57,865.08.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1832, to insert:

For interment of officers and men, $200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1833, to insert:

For apprehension of deserters, $120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1839, after the word "namely," to insert "four horses and;" in line 1841, after the word "thousand," to insert "eight hundred;" and in line 1845, after the word "all," to strike out "thirty-five thousand five" and insert "thirty-six thousand three;" so as to make the clause read:

Transportation: For transportation of material and funds, $25,000; for transportation of men, $8,875; means of transportation, namely, four horses and five mules, at not exceeding $200 each, $1,800; one set six-mule harness, $85; one set four-mule ambulance harness, $45; for leather, iron, and timbers for repairs to means of transportation, $500; in all, $36,305.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1878, after the word "pay," to insert "and allowances;" so as to make the clause read:

And there shall not be expended from any moneys appropriated by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes," any money for the support of the Signal Service or Corps, except the pay and allowances of such commissioned officers as the Secretary of War may detail for service in that corps, and except the appropriation of $5,000 therein contained for expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, and excepting also the pay and allowances of fourteen enlisted men detailed from the line of the Army serving with Lieutenant Greely in the Arctic regions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1894, after the words "Houses on," to strike out "the first" and insert "or before the third;" so as to make the clause read:

That a joint commission, consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall consider the present organizations of the Signal Service, Geological Survey, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, with the view to secure greater efficiency and economy of administration of the public service in said bureaus; and said joint commission shall report to their respective Houses on or before the third Monday in December, 1884, their conclusions, by bill or report.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "National cemeteries," after line 1916, to insert:

For purchase of additional landfor the Cypress Hills National Cemetery, near Brooklyn, New York, $15,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1920 to 1925, inclusive, as follows:

For the completion of the road from Chattanooga to the national cemetery near that city, $2,500: Provided, That said work shall be first advertised and let to the lowest bidder; and no part of this sum shall be expended for anything except for labor and material on said road.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to allow this amendment recommended by the committee to be disagreed to. I hold in my hand a statement from my colleague in the House, the immediate Representative of that district, in which he says, among other things, that the road leading from the city of Chattanooga to the national cemetery is almost impassable.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator repeat that language?

Mr. HARRIS. The language he uses is that the road is almost impassable; and this sum of $2,500 will finish it. The Government has expended large sums to beautify the grounds and has nearly finished the road. It should now finish it. The Quartermaster-General's estimate was $3,500, but the Representative says the sum of $2,500 will complete the road. I think about $12,000 have already been expended upon the making of the road from the city to the cemetery, yet the road is not completed. Two thousand five hundred dollars more will complete it; and the Government has expended already $12,000 on the roads, with certain other amounts expended in beautifying the cemetery. I hope the chairman of the committee will consent that this amendment may be disagreed to, and the appropriation of $2,500, absolutely necessary to complete it, may be made.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations struck this out for the reason that we had already appropriated $12,500 for this macadamized road and we have twice appropriated for its completion. Last year we were told that it would not require $2,500, and therefore we inserted in the appropriation of last year a provision "that the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated." We were determined that for once this road should be completed, because we supposed it would be completed with the appropriation made two years ago, and last year we provided that only so much as was necessary to complete it should be expended. Now the Senator reads a letter saying that this road is almost impassable. If $12,500 expended have made it impassable, I should like to know how much money it would take to complete the road so as to make it a proper macadamized road. That is the trouble with this Chattanooga affair, and that is the reason we struck it out. We have twice before appropriated for the completion of this road.

Mr. HARRIS. Twelve thousand five hundred dollars have been heretofore appropriated, and as the Senator from Iowa states the last year's appropriation contemplated completion, but it is not completed. The $12,500 have made a good road for the greater part of the distance, seven miles I believe it is from the city of Chattanooga to the cemetery; but there is yet a gap wholly unimproved, that is, according to the statement of my colleague in the House, which is perfectly reliable, almost if not quite impassable. It remains for the Senator from Iowa and the Senate to determine whether we shall appropriate the additional $2,500 to complete that part of the road that is wholly incomplete and almost impassable, or leave it impassable with the $12,500 already expended upon it without the accomplishment of the object. The error has been in the estimates of the officers of the Government, not the fault of that locality or that people. If they have underestimated it, if they have found the appropriations heretofore made inadequate to the work, the question for the Senate to determine is whether we shall make the necessary appropriation or turn our backs upon the $12,500 already expended and leave the road impassable, as I am assured it is, or nearly so, in its present condition.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the fault can be entirely with the officers who make these estimates, as I find the House has put in a provision here, "and no part of this sum shall be expended for anything except for labor and material on said road," from which I infer that a portion of the appropriations hitherto made has gone to some superintendent or some officer there who was supposed to be expending the appropriation upon himself rather than upon the labor necessary to complete the road. But inasmuch as I now have the assurance of the Senator from Tennessee that this road will be completed with this $2,500, and being now impassable will be very good after the money is expended, I shall make no further objection to his suggestions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1926, after the word "construction," to insert "and completion;" in line 1928, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" and after the word "dollars," at the end of the same line, to insert "and none of said money shall be expended until contracts shall be made for the completion of said road for the sum hereby appropriated;" so as to make the clause read:

For the construction and completion of a macadamized road from Springfield, Mo., to the national cemetery near that city, $20,000; and none of said money shall be expended until contracts shall be made for the completion of said road for the sum hereby appropriated.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, so that we may not have a repetition of this trouble, to move to insert $22,500 instead of $20,000, in line 1928.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "miscellaneous objects," in line 1952, after the word "with" to strike out "the Providence Hospital by" and insert "such institution as;" and in line 1953, after the word "Army," to insert "may select;" so as to make the clause read:

For the support and medical treatment of transient paupers: For the care, support, and medical treatment of seventy-five transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in the city of Washington, under a contract to be made with such institution as the Surgeon-General of the Army may select, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 1972.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the committee to offer a proviso to come in at this point, and it being in the nature of legislation, I ask unanimous consent. It is a proviso to the item as to the publication of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion.

The SECRETARY. After line 1972 it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the time fixed in said act be, and the same is hereby, extended from July 1, 1884, until July 1, 1885, and any act or joint resolution to the contrary be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 1986.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the word "legislation" and insert "Legislature" in line 1986; so as to read:

In accordance with the action of the Legislature of Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made if there be no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1988, to insert:

For payment of the expenses of a board of three officers of the Army to be detailed to assist the Secretary of War in examining and reporting upon the claims of the States and Territories named in the act of June 27, 1882, while on said duty, including clerk-hire and hotel, traveling, and such other necessary expenses as may be approved by the Secretary of War, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That said officers shall, before proceeding to the discharge of said duties, be sworn that they will carefully examine said claims, and that they will, to the best of their ability, make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof, as required by said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2001, to insert:

Bounty to volunteers and their widows and legal heirs: For payment of amounts of bounty to volunteer soldiers who served in the war of the rebellion, and their widows and their legal heirs, which may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2007, to insert:

Bounty under act of July 28, 1866: For payment of amounts of additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, which may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2013, to insert:

Pay of two and three year volunteers: For payment of amounts to two and three year volunteers who served in the war of the rebellion which may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2018, to insert:

Army and Navy hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.: For supplying bath-house, main building, and annex with hot and cold mineral waters, $8,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that amendment will be disagreed to. It was inserted under a misapprehension.

Mr. GARLAND. What is the reason of the opposition to the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment is:

For supplying the bath-house, main building, and annex with hot and cold mineral waters, $8,000.

The building is not yet completed and probably will not be completed until we meet again next winter, and there is no appropriation for the furnishing of the building. It is hardly worth while to appropriate for supplying the building until after we have completed it in such a way as to get it ready for occupancy.

Mr. GARLAND. It is a mere matter of conjecture whether the building will be completed in the time the Senator from Iowa indicates. There is no proof that it will not be; and before the committee yesterday I understood it was unanimously agreed that this amount should be appropriated. The truth is an appropriation of $25,000 is needed, but the committee reduced the amount to $8,000 and I certainly see no reason why it should be rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. I had intended to invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this case. The hospital building, I am authoritatively informed, will be finished in October; and if it is desired to occupy the building as a hospital, a further appropriation ought to be made. There ought to be at least the further appropriations estimated by the Surgeon-General and approved by the Secretary of War; and if they be made, the building can be ready for general use and occupation next March; but if nothing further is done than is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations the work can not be resumed until after the 1st of July, 1885, and the building will be ready for occupation perhaps in October, November, or December of that year. It is just a question of whether we wish to go straight along and finish the building. Furnishing a bath-house and furnishing hot and cold water will be of no use unless you proceed with the other estimates sent in by the Secretary of War for grading and improving the grounds. The gentlemen familiar with that place tell me it is exceedingly rough and that considerable grading is absolutely necessary. In the next place, you will need hospital appliances, necessary office and other furniture for a hospital, $15,258.10 by the estimates.

Mr. ALLISON. How much for the grading?

Mr. HAWLEY. For grading and improving grounds—this is the Surgeon-General's estimate—$27,673; for hospital appliances, furniture, and bedding, &c., $15,258; for means of transportation required for the use of the hospital, including ambulances, wagons, horses, mules, stable equipments, forage, and pay of teamsters, $5,438.26. Then, for expenses of maintenance for one year—for you must have some doctors and employés to support it—including subsistence of patients, pay of employés, fuel, gas, stationery, ice, tools, farming implements, $3,400.70.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will withdraw my suggestion and let this amendment go in. I would rather allow this to remain than to carry out the suggestions of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did the Senator propose to strike out the $8,000?

Mr. ALLISON. I did; but after hearing the Senator as far as I have, I am quite willing to allow it to go in.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to give the inexperienced and youthful Senator from Iowa notice that if he is about to allow this to be a Government hospital, something more is necessary than a building and a bath-house. He must have an ambulance and a doctor at least.

Mr. ALLISON. I was rather of that impression myself; but it will take a considerable sum of money to carry out the suggestions made by the Surgeon-General, and inasmuch as the committee believed that it was not necessary to do that at this time, they only inserted this one provision, which we supposed was for the erection of a bath-house, and not for the supplying of water to it. Therefore I am quite willing to leave this out or in, just as the Senate prefers.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is $8,000 toward the completion of the building, and the Senate must give the other $80,000 now, or next winter, or let the building stand idle.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4651) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations to insert lines 2019 to 2022, inclusive.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Iowa withdrew his objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2084, to insert:

For the construction of a fire-proof building for headquarters and library at the Artillery School, Fortress Monroe, Va., as per plans submitted to Congress December 6, 1880, and printed in Senate Executive Document No. 2, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," after line 2096, to insert:

For addition to hospital at the Central Branch, at Dayton, Ohio, $63,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2116, to increase the appropriation

"for Southern Branch, to build and complete new hospital," from $87,000 to $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2120, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for "National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers" from $1,299,134 to $1,400,484.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2127, to insert:

UNDER THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

For rent of an additional building or additional rooms for the use of the money-order office of the Post-Office Department, and of the money-order division of the auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, $1,800, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For gas, $400; stoves, $400; and for furniture for money-order office, $500; in all, $1,300.

To enable the Postmaster-General to carry out the provisions of the law passed at the present session allowing fifteen days' leave of absence with pay to letter-carriers, $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out, in line 2140, after the word "law," the words "passed at the present session." That is not necessary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I do not rise to oppose the amendment, but to call attention to a fact. We have allowed the letter-carriers fifteen days leave of absence, and that means to allow everybody from fifteen to twenty days. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is now urging it. We are doing it everywhere else, and we are advised that it will require from $100,000 to $150,000 to employ temporarily persons to do this work and to do it satisfactorily, during the fifteen days that we are allowing the letter-carriers to leave their work. One hundred thousand dollars was asked, $50,000 is allowed, to bridge it over until December, when we can make a further allowance.

I only rose to say that while we appear to be doing very fine things in a small way we are required to pay immense sums of money to do them, and injuring the public service by temporarily employing people who know nothing about the business during the days the regular persons are not employed. So it will be in every department of the Government; the moment you give it to one you must give it to all, because all insist that they have the same rights.

There are several other hundred thousand dollars that will have to go very soon if this is done now. It might as well be understood that the small things we are appearing to do as mere matters that amount to nothing really involve hundreds of thousands of dollars, and sometimes millions.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 2143 I think the "i" had better come out; so as to read "electoral."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter "i" will be taken from the word "electorial" if there be no objection. The reading will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "District of Columbia," to strike out from line 2154 to 2157, as follows:

For the construction of an addition to the building known as the Home of the Little Sisters of the Poor in the city of Washington, D. C., $25,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the committee not to insist upon that amendment.

Mr. BECK. I believe the chairman of the committee said he was instructed this morning by the whole committee not to insist on striking that out. The subcommittee struck it out. The whole committee have inserted it, not I think because they want it, but because the Garfield Hospital and a number of other items of the same class are sought to be added. I believe I am correct in that.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed to offer an amendment for the Garfield Memorial Hospital.

Mr. BECK. It is just as well to begin here to state the situation. We sought to divorce, if I may use the word, the District of Columbia matters from the sundry civil bill, and in the District of Columbia bill we have made provision for a great many of these charities. I hold it in my hand. It provides for eight or ten of them; but not content with that and with what has been inserted here, a pressure is made by very clever people and very generous people and Christian people for all sorts of amendments to be added to the sundry civil bill. We are not getting clear apparently of the difficulties of mixing up the charity system of the District of Columbia as it was before by having a separate bill for the District of Columbia. I hold in my hand a number of other amendments which the committee have not agreed to, quite as meritorious as the Garfield Hospital item and those now being inserted, all of which, if we are going into that business, I shall endeavor to have inserted, because there is no use of giving aid to one unless you aid all these institutions. I think the Senate had better stop now for the time being, and let them be content with the aid which has been given in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and not open the door to all the amendments which will be suggested to this bill by the various charities in the District of Columbia.

That is all I care to say. This is just as good as any of the others, and I am not sure but a little more meritorious than many others which will be offered. I am not yet prepared to say that a point of order can be sustained when the other amendments are offered. I think they are private matters. At least I shall ask the Chair to rule upon that point when the occasion arises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of what the Senator from Kentucky has said I hope this amendment will be passed over until we see what we do with the other items to which he has referred.

Mr. BECK. If the amendment fails to prevail, the item having been inserted by the House will still be in the bill; and we are going through this anomaly all the time under the rules of the Senate, that matters which are ruled out of order because they are legislation can not be considered here because they are new legislation; but once being inserted in the House bill they are open to a committee of conference, and that committee of conference, composed of three men from each House, can put on what they like, irrespective of the rules of either House, and the Senate and the House have to pass upon the conference report as a whole. No point of order can be made upon that, I suppose.

The Chair smiles as though I was wrong there. I am so apt to be wrong on points of order that perhaps I am; but that will be the practical result; that is the way it always works, law or no law. I have referred to the tariff conference of last year before; we know something about that. The result is going to be that when a thing is once in the bill and the conferees get together they will do pretty much as they please. The Little Sisters of the Poor are in the bill by the action of the House. I admit that; and refusing to agree to the motion to strike out does not take out the item. I think we had better begin with it now and strike out all the items of this class.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it proper to say for the information of the Senate, although the question is not at this moment presented for his decision, that he has examined the question as to the power of conferees that has arisen on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and is of opinion that it is not within the power of the Senate conferees to report in favor of the Senate agreeing to an amendment to a House bill that would not be in order if recommended by any other committee of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. But allow me to ask for information—suppose they do it, their report has to be acted on as a whole, and I suppose the Chair could not strike out that part of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair could not strike it out; but the Chair, if the point were made, would be obliged to hold, after having investigated the subject, that such a report was irregular. That would leave the Senate to do what it chose with the other amendments or to overrule the Chair. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. HALE. Some of the Senators did not hear precisely what was the ruling of the Chair with reference to the power of conference committees upon amendments. I did not myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has made no ruling, but he thought it right for the information of the Senate to state his opinion, formed upon investigation in respect to the power of conferees. The Chair is of opinion that it is not within the power of the conferees of the Senate to put into a bill anything that any committee of the Senate could not put in or that members could not put in.

Mr. HALE. As an amendment to a House proposition coming to the Senate from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Precisely the same point of order can be made, the Chair thinks, against the report of a committee of conference in respect to putting legislation on a bill that could be made against a report from any committee of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. But supposing that in conference of the two Houses the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives propose an amendment to a provision that the House has inserted in an appropriation bill, an amendment entirely germane under the rules of the House, and modifying a proposition that has passed the House, and the conferees on the part of the Senate agree to that amendment and report as a conference committee the original proposition that came from the House with an amendment in order under the rules of the House, would the Chair, I will not say rule, but intimate that the ruling would be that there was no power on the part of the conferees to do that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that in his opinion, formed after study and investigation, the conferees on the part of the Senate are merely its agents, that they are not governed or affected or instructed by any rule of the other body but by our rules, and therefore if anything that the conferees of the Senate recommend to the Senate to be concurred in in the House bill is a proposition which if proposed in this Chamber from a committee would not be in order, it would not be in order if recommended by a committee of conference.

Mr. HALE. That would revolutionize all the practice as to conference reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be. The Chair only states what he thinks the law of the Senate is.

Mr. HALE. Then when a proposition comes from the House originally, under their rules, objectionable, offensive as it may be to the Senate, the Senate can not say or do anything, because the House, under its rules, has sent a proposition here To hold that in a joint conference of the two bodies, represented by conference committees, there can not be an amendment to that original proposition of the House that is according to their rules adopted and sent to this body, I think, as I have said, introduces an entirely new practice.

I am not prepared to argue that question, but I think that the Senate should take notice that it is an absolute change of what has been the practice with reference to conference reports. I may say here that I do not believe in extending the power of conference committees. That power is enormous at present. It is a power that ex necessitate rei is not much questioned; but whenever any question does arise, I believe it is the duty of conferees, largely on the appropriation bills made up from members of the Appropriations Committee, where there is any doubt about it to give the decision in favor of not extending their power. I do not think anything ought to be done by the conferees appointed from the Committee on Appropriations that under any circumstances should raise a question in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. This question, however grave and important, is not now before the Senate. The Chair has notified the Senate as to the opinion that the Chair entertains, which I think is precisely correct; but I beg that we do not undertake to debate the question now, because it is not pending. When it becomes practical, we can then talk about it.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to do so, but the days and hours are waning, and I wish to call attention to the matter now, as some guidance for the conference reports that may come in for the rest of the session. Let the intimation made by the Chair be regarded and considered with reference to conference reports.

Mr. ALDRICH. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that it may not be profitable to discuss this question from the purely hypothetical standpoint. There is a matter pending now before the Senate, or liable to be called before the Senate at any time, the conference report upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which will raise the practical point whenever that conference report is under consideration, and I should like to have it called up as soon as this bill is disposed of so that the question may be practically settled by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought it right to mention in reply to the Senator from Kentucky what the views of the Chair are upon the subject. The Chair will take the liberty of saying, in addition, to the Senator from Maine, that the Chair thinks the Senator from Maine is under a misapprehension as respects the nature of a conference. The conferees of each House, the Chair thinks, are entirely independent of the other, and merely represent the views of their own House. They, in their conduct, are governed by the rules of their own House, and not by the rules of the other. A conference report may be properly made, the Chair thinks, by the Senate conferees upon any bill, whether the gentlemen of the other House should sign the report or not. The only object, the Chair supposes, of the report being signed by the conferees on both sides is to identify with absolute certainty what they have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as of their own right.

The Chair begs to apologize for having suggested the question now, although he thought it right to do so in view of what the Senator from Kentucky had said. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out the words which have been reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. A. S. WILLIS of Kentucky, Mr. N. C. BLANCHARD of Louisiana, and Mr. T. J. HENDERSON of Illinois managers at the conference on its part.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the message from the House be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. The bill passed the Senate with sundry amendments, and is returned from the House with a message, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 2, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIS, Mr. BLANCHARD, and Mr. T. J. HENDERSON be the managers of the said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House and agree to the conference thereon asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. RANSOM were appointed.

FOURTH OF JULY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg leave to submit a resolution which I will ask to lie over until to-morrow morning, unless the Senate by unanimous consent see proper to adopt it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information, if there be no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will meet at the usual hour on Friday, the 4th day of July, instant, and after the reading of the Journal, and before other business is done, the Secretary of the Senate shall read the Declaration of American Independence and Washington's Farewell Address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio to ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it lie over.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any objection, let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed, and go over.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 2157, to insert:

For repairs to the police-court building, District of Columbia, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2161, to insert:

To pay to the Church Orphanage Association of Saint John's church for the erection of a building for the use of said orphanage, of Washington, D. C., $6,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert at this point the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it an amendment to the paragraph just read?

Mr. ALLISON. It is an independent amendment.

Mr. BECK. I rise for the purpose of asking the Senate to strike out the clause just read in order to prevent so many others from coming in. I do not believe there is any serious objection to this item. The building in which those people now keep, and have done so for fourteen years, some fifty-odd children and have taken care of them, is in such a dilapidated condition that it has been condemned by the commissioners as unsafe and dangerous; but I really feel that in doing it we are opening the door to too many applications and we ought not to aid those people in building an additional building or one that shall be safe, as they have been ordered to do by the commissioners. In other words, the house is condemned and we ought to aid them to get one in which they can safely take care of the children; but if it is going to open the door to all the others, I think the paragraph had better go out.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that the committee has recommended us to strike out, and the Senate has agreed to strike out, a special appropriation for the Little Sisters of the Poor. It seems to me we ought to observe some uniformity with reference to this sort of appropriations. For one, I can see how the burdens of taxation in the District and the obligation of the District government to take care of the unfortunate classes here may be relieved by these private charities. I have no doubt the institution of the Little Sisters of the Poor and this Church Orphanage Association both do a great deal toward relieving taxation, and in that view it may be proper to make some annual appropriation for the maintenance of the dependent ones who would otherwise fall upon the District for support. But if we once go into the business of putting up orphanages and homes under the supervision of the different churches in the District, it seems to me we are entering upon a pretty wide field of operation. I would not make a distinction between the churches. No doubt in each of these instances they are doing a good work, but I think if we start into the business of building houses for the different churches we shall run through the whole list and we can not stop. I think we had better stop now and not agree to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will now be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the vote just taken with reference to these charities in the District of Columbia, I feel instructed by the committee to withdraw the amendment I was about to offer a few moments ago.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2165, to insert:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby directed to allow and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each of such persons, or their legal representatives, who were officers, clerks, and employés of the metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia on the 28th of February, 1867, a sum equal to 20 per cent. on the salary of such persons as fixed by law, for the time stated in said resolution of the 28th of February, 1867.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2175, to insert:

That the sum of $85,000 appropriated for the Boundary street intercepting sewer by the act approved July 1, 1882, is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available for work done and to be done under the contracts heretofore made for its expenditure, or such future contracts as shall be made therefor.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the last two appropriations inserted are appropriations out of the Treasury entirely, and there is no clause attached to them which requires one-half to be taken out of the treasury of the District of Columbia. I therefore move to add——

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the last item is simply reappropriating the interest paid, one-half by the District and one-half by the United States, under a previous law passed some years ago.

Mr. PLUMB. That may be, but that would not be the case with reference to the preceding paragraph, at all events.

Mr. ALLISON. I see now what the Senator alludes to specially, to the paragraph from line 2166 to line 2175. For myself, I do not father that amendment in any sense, and I leave it to others to promote it. The Senate passed at this session a separate bill requiring the payment of this money.

Mr. PLUMB. Has it passed both Houses?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I move a reconsideration of the vote by which that amendment was adopted. I had not observed its terms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that the vote agreeing to the amendment reported from the committee inserting the paragraph from lines 2166 to 2175 be reconsidered. It will be reconsidered if there be no objection. It is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The Senate has acted upon the measure, but not the House, and it is proper to leave it until the other branch of Congress shall have acted upon the subject-matter.

Mr. VANCE. I understand a vote is to be taken on the proposition to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote was reconsidered, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. VANCE. On that I wish to say a word. This is a claim founded upon a joint resolution of the two Houses passed seventeen years ago, paying 20 per cent.——

Mr. PLUMB. I feel under the circumstances, after the statement of the Senator from North Carolina, constrained to make the point of order on the amendment that it is a private claim.

Mr. VANCE. The Chair will see that it is in pursuance of an existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Kansas to make a point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I raise the point of order on the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be glad to be informed whether there is any existing law which requires the payment of this sum of money.

Mr. HARRIS. In 1867 there was an act passed allowing certain extra pay to certain officers. The accounting officers of the Treasury held that the act did not apply to the class of persons provided for in this amendment and declined to pay them. Some one of that class made a test case. It went to the Supreme Court of the United States and the court decided that it did cover this class of persons. A private bill for the relief of this class has been introduced from session to session for many sessions and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, at the present session as well as at former sessions. The committee reported at this session of Congress in favor of the passage of that private bill.

Mr. BECK. It was passed.

Mr. BUTLER. It passed the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. It has passed the Senate, but it has not yet passed the other House. That is the exact history of the case.

Mr. BECK. The act of February 28, 1867, Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 569, contains the language referred to by the Senator from Tennessee, which is in these words:

An additional compensation of 20 per cent. on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or, where no salary is fixed by law, upon their pay respectively, for one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866.

That has been construed by the Senate by the passage of the bill reported by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], and which had been reported two years ago by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and had a unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House by the Representative from Vermont [Mr. POLAND]. I suppose there is no doubt under all the constructions given that there is an existing law for the payment. It was upon that theory that we proceeded yesterday in considering the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The Supreme Court decided the case.

Mr. BECK. The Supreme Court has decided that these policemen were embraced in the law. I had all those reports, but I can not lay my hand on them now. I thought the clerk of the committee had them with him. They were lying on my table this morning, and gave all the facts. The report of the Senator from North Carolina contains the decision of the Supreme Court in 28 Wallace, 588, and the authorities are referred to where they sustain the claims and say they come within the provisions of the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair remembers the case. The Chair understands that this is a provision for the payment of overdue salaries to a class of officers who according to this decision are entitled under a former law to a salary that has not been paid them. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order, thinking that if Congress has failed to appropriate for general salaries to a class of officers that in point of law they were entitled to, the amendment does not fall within the provision in relation to private claims. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to add at the end of line 2182 these words:

One-half of said sum appropriated by the two preceding paragraphs to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States and the other half to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The system of intercepting-sewers is very expensive. Work was undertaken by the Government of the United States in the first instance without respect to the District authorities. It is really a system of conveying water from the outlying regions off into Rock Creek and into the Eastern Branch, and originally was not designed to be charged upon the District of Columbia. It seems to me it is not right that it should be charged to the District of Columbia. At the last session of Congress, if I remember aright, or perhaps at this session, there was a provision made that the District government should pay interest at the rate of 3 per cent. upon one-half of the cost of these intercepting sewers. If the Senator would confine his amendment to that provision it would be all right, but to load the District government with this $40,000, to come out of their current revenue, would probably prevent them from availing themselves for general city purposes of the District revenues.

I should have no objection if the Senator would make his amendment requiring that one-half of this should be paid in the same mode and manner directed by existing law for the other appropriations for intercepting-sewers, and I think that requires them to pay at the rate of 3 per cent. interest.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is I think mistaken. This originally was appropriated to be paid in just the way I propose now to pay it; but by reason of the construction of the First Comptroller of the Treasury in regard to the contract under which the money was to be expended, it could not be expended. The commissioners came down and asked us to put it in the District of Columbia bill. It was put in that bill; but when the matter came into conference the House conferees objected to the last part of the amendment on account of its reference to a former contract, and after some conference it was left out in order to ascertain exactly how the law was. The commissioners asked that it be put in this bill in the same way. It only went out of the former bill for the reason I stated a moment ago. It will not impair their funds at all. It is entirely proper that one-half of this expense should be paid by the District.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed by a member of the District Committee that the provision I spoke of applied only to the aqueduct. If the ordinary disposition of this money is that one-half of it is charged to the District, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is. I know there was a 3 per cent. proposition such as is referred to by the Senator from Ohio applied to the appropriation for extending the aqueduct, but I do not remember any such proposition in respect to any other matter.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so far as the last item is concerned, under the District act of 1882, without any such amendment as is proposed by the Senator from Kansas, one-half of this item would be paid by the District of Columbia, because this is simply a reappropriation of money appropriated in 1882 when the District was obliged to pay one-half. I do not think they ought to pay out of the current revenues of the District one-half of the other appropriation. That appropriation is for the Metropolitan police of 1867. At that time the entire Metropolitan police was paid by the Government of the United States. It seems to me it would be wrong to put upon the expenditures of the District for 1885 an expense that was incurred by the Government of the United States itself in 1867.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was before the District government was formed.

Mr. ALLISON. Long before the District government was formed. I think it is not a wise thing to do.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well; I have no objection to making the amendment apply simply to the latter section.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, the last paragraph, the one contained in line 2176 to line 2182?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; the last paragraph.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as it applies to sewers I think it is entirely right; but I think it ought not to be applied to the other item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the "miscellaneous" appropriations "under the Department of Justice," after line 2193, to insert:

For the expenses of Territorial courts in Utah Territory: For defraying the contingent expenses of the courts, including fees of the United States district attorney and his assistants; the fees and per diems of the United States commissioners and clerks of the court; and the fees, per diems, and traveling expenses of the United States marshal for the Territory of Utah, with the expenses of summoning jurors, subpœnaing witnesses; of arresting, guarding, and transporting prisoners; of hiring and feeding guards; and of supplying and caring for the penitentiary, to be paid under the direction and approval of the Attorney-General, upon accounts duly verified and certified, $26,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2213, after "Court of Claims," to insert "including the pay of one assistant, at a salary of $3,000;" and, in line 2215, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "sixteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For defending suits in claims against the United States: For defraying the necessary expenses incurred in the examination of witnesses and procuring of evidence in the matter of claims against the United States and the District of Columbia pending in any Department, and for necessary expenses incurred in defending suits in the Court of Claims, including the pay of one assistant, at a salary of $3,000, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2237, after the word "agents," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For the prosecution of crimes: For the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States, preliminary to indictment, and for the investigation of official acts, records, and accounts of officers of the courts, including the investigation of the accounts of marshals, attorneys, clerks of the United States courts, and United States commissioners, under the direction of the Attorney-General, and for this purpose all the records and dockets of these officers, without exception, shall be open to the examination of his duly authorized agents, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2238, to insert:

For compiling and printing two hundred copies of the compilation of laws applicable to the duties of the governor, attorney, judges, clerk, marshals, and commissioners for the district of Alaska, provided for by section 11 of the act approved May 17, 1884, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2244, to insert:

To defray the actual and necessary traveling expenses of the officers to be appointed for the civil district of Alaska from their homes to their stations in Alaska, at $300 each, $1,500.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if that is the title of "the provisional government for Alaska?" Are these the judicial officers? I did not understand that it was called the "civil district."

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will allow me to answer, I will state that it includes all the officers to be appointed, and the description is correct here. It is called in the Alaska act "the civil district of Alaska."

Mr. ALLISON. We supposed we had it right, but I am not certain.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed it referred to the judicial district, and not the Territorial government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2249, to insert:

To pay the amount of final judgment rendered in the suit of Hallet Kilbourne against John G. Thompson, former Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2253, to insert:

To pay the costs of court in said case, $143.17.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2255, to insert:

To pay Shellabarger and Wilson counsel fees in said case, $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the words, "Shellabarger and Wilson." I do not know of any other counsel, but it is intended to pay the counsel fees on the part of the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio who will have the distribution of the fund then; the Attorney-General?

Mr. ALLISON. The Department of Justice.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1861) for the relief of the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa; and

An act (S. 534) for the relief of J. T. Pickett.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 9,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the year 1883.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREY AND OTHERS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yesterday the House requested the Senate to return a certain bill to the House for consideration. That bill was in the hands of the Committee on Claims. I now report back the bill, being the bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator desire to be made of the bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill is not on the Calendar. The House yesterday requested the Senate to return the bill to the House for further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to discharge the committee will be entered. The Chair understands that the order to return the bill has already been made.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not know whether the order was made yesterday or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. It had better be made anyway.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If it has been made, it is not necessary to make it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the order was made yesterday on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The Chair begs to call the attention of the Senate to House bill No. 2185. A message was received from the House of Representatives yesterday asking that the bill be returned. The RECORD shows that it was ordered on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the bill be returned to the House of Representatives. The Chair finds that the Journal does not contain an entry of the order that was made. The Chair asks unanimous consent, therefore, that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be corrected so as to show the fact that the Secretary was directed to return the bill to the House of Representatives. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 2270.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the fact that the committee recommend the striking out of the legislative sections of the bill, I move to amend by striking out from line 2271 to 2280, in the following words:

For salaries of United States marshals, $219,000.

For salaries of marshals' clerks and chief deputies, $110,000.

For expenses of marshals, namely, for transportation to attend courts, postage on process, and for fees and expenses of deputies, and of sheriffs and constables acting as deputies as provided by law, and for pay of special deputy marshals under title 26 of the Revised Statutes, $300,000.

And to insert:

For payment of the fees and expenses of United States marshals and deputies, $629,000.

Mr. COKE. I suppose that this amendment of the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will ask that the amendment I suggest be passed over for the present until we settle the question of legislation.

Mr. COKE. I was going to suggest that we pass it over and settle the succeeding clauses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the question on this amendment——

Mr. ALLISON. On all the matter down to line 2287.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the paragraphs on page 93

from the top of the page to the end of line 2287 be passed over informally to be resumed later. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Judicial," in the appropriations for the "United States courts," in line 2289, after the words "for fees of clerks, $160,000," to insert:

Provided, That the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States shall, on the 1st day of January next, or within thirty days thereafter, and annually thereafter, make to the Secretary of the Treasury a return of all costs collected by him in cases disposed of at the preceding term or terms of said Supreme Court; and, after deducting his compensation as provided by law, and the incidental expenses of his office, including clerk-hire, said expenses to be certified by the Chief Justice or a justice of said court, shall pay any surplus that may remain into the Treasury of the United States at the time of making said return.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. If section 2 is to be stricken out the provision in lines 2327 to 2329 would be superfluous. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to that fact.

Mr. ALLISON. I know there is no requirement for such an appropriation now; but still the committee thought there would be no special harm in having a uniform system of accounts among all the marshals and clerks. If the Senator objects to it——

Mr. INGALLS. No, I do not object to it, except that it is not a provision of existing law. The Senator will observe that it depends upon that clause of the provision proposed to be stricken out on page 98, between lines 2402 and 2412.

Mr. ALLISON. So it does, but still in itself it is not a bad provision to have a uniform system of bookkeeping for United States marshals and clerks. However, I have no objection to striking it out.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 2330 to 2733, inclusive, as follows:

SEC. 2. That United States marshals shall hereafter receive annually for their services the following salaries, payable monthly: Southern district of New York, $6,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, and California, $5,000 each; Maryland, Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Missouri, Kentucky, Northern Ohio, Northern and Southern Illinois, Eastern Louisiana, Kansas, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other marshals shall be paid a salary of $3,000 a year.

All money collected by marshals on process in behalf of the United States, and all costs for fees and expenses of marshals taxed against parties other than the United States, shall be collected by the marshals and be paid into court; and at the end of each quarter the marshal shall render a return of the moneys so collected to the Attorney-General, with receipts from the clerks of the courts for the sums paid as herein required, which returns shall be verified by the oath of the marshal; and if this statement is not received by the Attorney-General within thirty days from the close of the quarter, no further payments shall be made the marshal on account of salary until such statement is received. Upon application to him for service, the marshal, before service is made, shall exact a deposit for the costs thereof in all cases not brought by the United States, except in suits brought under chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes, for wages of seamen, wherein the costs, if not collectible from the parties to the suit, shall be charged by the marshal, clerk, and district attorney in their accounts against the United States, and shall be adjusted and paid by accounting officers in the same manner as costs in cases brought by the United States. If he shall fail to exact such deposit he shall be responsible for the amount to the United States.

It shall be the duty of the marshal to scrutinize the bills of the deputies, sheriffs, or constables, or whoever may be employed to serve process, and when he finds the same to be correct and in accordance with law he shall pay the same; but in cases where he deems it advisable for his own protection he may withhold 25 per cent. of the amount until the said bills have been audited and allowed at the Treasury; and when so allowed he shall pay the amount found due each in full. At the close of each term of court the marshal shall make up his account for all fees and disbursements and submit the same to a circuit or district court, in accordance with the provisions of the act regulating fees and costs, approved February 22, 1875, which shall be examined and passed upon by the court at each term before its adjournment.

SEC. 3. That there may be allowed each United States marshal one clerk and one chief deputy, whose salaries shall be paid as provided in section 2 for the payment of marshals. The salaries shall be $1,800 a year in each of the following districts: Northern New York, Southern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, Kentucky, Northern Illinois, and California.

In other districts the salary shall be determined by the Attorney-General, but shall not exceed $1,200 per annum in any case. No clerk or chief deputy shall be appointed in any district unless the Attorney-General shall deem such appointment necessary for the efficient performance of the public business.

In all districts where courts are held at more than one place at which grand jurors are impaneled, the Attorney-General may, in his discretion, allow the marshal a clerk or chief deputy (but not both) at such place, in addition to the one hereinbefore authorized, if the business of the office requires it, at a salary not to exceed $1,000 a year.

The Attorney-General shall provide a uniform system of bookkeeping and returns, and furnish books and blanks for this purpose to the United States marshals. It shall be their duty to keep all the accounts, books, and papers of their respective offices in such manner as may be required by regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General, and to perform such other duties as such regulations may require. All books, papers, and accounts relating in any way to official business shall remain in the office of the marshal and be transferred by him to his successor in office, and shall be open at all times to the inspection of parties interested.

Any person who steals, takes away, falsifies, mutilates, or otherwise alters, destroys, or conceals any book, record, or paper by law required to be in the custody of the marshal, or who counsels, aids, or abets such stealing, taking away, altering, falsfying, mutilating, destroying, or concealing of any such book, record, or paper, shall be guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment at labor not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

It shall be the duty of the chief deputy marshal to assist the marshal in attending upon the sessions of the court, and to perform all other duties required of him by the marshal of the court.

No officer of the court shall require payment from any juror or witness for stating his account for expenses of transportation or for administering oath to the same; and it shall be the duty of the marshal to examine said bills before paying the same, and to strike out improper charges if any are made therein.

The marshals' clerks, the chief deputies, and other deputies shall be appointed by the Attorney-General, upon the recommendation of the marshals of the respective districts; and their oaths of office shall be filed in the Department of Justice; and they shall be of good character and be able to read and write in the English language, and be subject to removal for cause by the Attorney-General, by the court, or marshal: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way repealing or modifying sections 2021, 2022, 2023, 2024, and 3689 of the Revised Statutes, nor of any other of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes, nor of any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

SEC. 4. That deputy marshals shall be appointed in the manner provided in the foregoing section for such localities in the district as the judge of the district or circuit courts may authorize and require for the efficient transaction of of the business of the United States courts of such districts in each locality, but their powers shall not be limited by the locality for which they are appointed. No person shall perform the duties of a deputy marshal unless appointed and qualified in the manner herein provided, but district or circuit courts may appoint, upon the recommendation of the marshals, any sheriff or constable, holding commission as such under State authority, to serve the writs or execute the processes issuing out of the courts in such district, after having been duly commissioned a deputy by order of the court. In all cases where practicable it shall be the duty of the marshal to send writs and processes of court by mail directed to the deputy marshal residing in the locality where writs are to be served or processes to be executed, or to the sheriff or constable appointed to serve the same in such locality, whose duty it shall be, after service, to return such writ or process by mail to the marshal; and in no case shall fees be charged or allowed for traveling between points where writs or processes were sent by mail, or where it was practicable to send them by mail. The fees now allowed by law for marshals for serving writs and processes shall hereafter be allowed to the officers serving the same, except for committing and discharging prisoners; and the clause in section 829 of the Revised Statutes prescribing 50 cents for the same is hereby repealed. No fee for serving process shall be paid to a chief deputy. Guards, when actually necessary, may be employed to assist deputy marshals, sheriffs, or constables in charge of prisoners and witnesses before commissioners or justices of the peace, but not more than two before the same officer shall be employed on any one day.

SEC. 5. That deputy marshals, sheriffs, and constables, while serving court processes, shall be allowed for transportation by public conveyances the amount actually paid therefor, which shall be stated in an itemized account, and shall not exceed the usual amount charged for such transportation. For traveling where there is no public conveyance they shall be allowed 10 cents per mile each way, and for serving writs and processes the fees provided by law. The costs shall in each case be indorsed in items on the back of the writ when the return is made.

SEC. 6. That the circuit or district courts of the United States may, in cases of emergency where the necessary processes of the courts can not be promptly executed by the marshal or his regular deputies so as to secure the ends of justice, enter an order of record requiring the marshal or one of his deputies, or a person appointed as special deputy marshal by the court for that purpose, to perform a particular service or execute a particular writ; and for such service there shall be allowed such compensation as may be just and reasonable, but not exceeding $2.50 a day, and actual and necessary traveling expenses, in lieu of fees and mileage. All accounts for such service shall be stated in items and verified by the person performing the service, and approved as a separate account by the judge who may make the order requiring the same.

SEC. 7. That district attorneys of the United States shall hereafter be paid monthly for their services the following annual salaries, in lieu of all fees, allowances, and salary now authorized by law: Southern New York, $8,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Northern and Southern Ohio, Eastern Missouri, Northern and Southern Illinois, and California, $5,000 each; Maryland, Kentucky, Kansas, Eastern Louisiana, Northern Georgia, Western Arkansas, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other United States district attorneys shall be paid each a salary of $3,000 a year.

In all proceedings, civil or criminal, including prizes and revenue cases, where fees or compensation of any kind are now by law authorized to be taxed against and paid by the United States for services of district attorneys or their assistants, no fees or percentages or commissions shall be charged or allowed on that account. In all cases, civil or criminal, including prize and revenue cases, where services are performed by district attorneys or their assistants, and the costs are taxed against other parties than the United States, the amount of such costs or fees for such service shall be collected and paid into court. United States district attorneys shall, under the direction of the Attorney-General, attend to the interests of the United States in every suit or proceeding in which the United States is concerned, in any of the courts of the United States or in the courts of any State, or attend to any other interest of the United States in their respective districts.

SEC. 8. That the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks shall be allowed, once for each term of court, the actual amount paid by them for transportation in going to and returning from the place where the court may be held in the district, the itemized accounts for such transportation to be made out and verified as hereinafter provided in other cases where transportation is allowed. District attorneys shall also be allowed the actual amount paid by them for necessary transportation to and from their places of abode to places where criminal examinations are held, or from one such place to another.

SEC. 9. That the fees earned by the clerks of United States courts, the supreme and district courts of the Territories, and the courts of the District of Columbia for services in civil and criminal cases and in naturalization cases, and for making out, certifying, or authenticating all papers, and in bankruptcy proceedings, and for duties of masters in chancery, or as special commissioners or referees by order of the court, or taking or authenticating depositions, issuing certificates admitting attorneys to practice, and in all matters of any name and character incident to their office or by virtue or authority of the court, and as United States commissioners, if holding said office, shall be included in their semi-annual returns to the Attorney-General; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to decide what expenses may be paid by such clerks out of the surplus emoluments of their offices. At the end of each quarter they shall make out an itemized statement of all costs paid into court in United States cases, showing what disposition has been made of the same and in what cases they accrued, and submit the same to the district court, who shall examine the same, and cause such clerks to subscribe an oath to the correctness of each and every item in such statement. If the judge approves such statement as correct, he shall indorse his approval thereon in writing, and the clerk shall thereupon transmit said statement to the Attorney-General. The clerks of the circuit and district courts, of the supreme and district courts of the Territories, and of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall not receive annually exceeding $2,500 each for their services; and where one person is clerk of both the circuit and district courts, such clerk shall not receive for services in both capacities a sum exceeding $3,000 per annum, except the clerks of the district and circuit courts for the southern district of New York, who may each receive $3,500 annually for their services. From the fees and emoluments earned and so reported by such clerks no one of them shall be allowed an amount exceeding the maximum herein provided; and after deducting the payment of deputy clerks, of office expenses, and any other allowances authorized by the Attorney-General, the balance of such fees and emoluments, if any, over and above the said maximum amount, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States according to the provisions of section 844 of the Revised Statutes; which payments shall be ascertained at the Treasury Department upon quarterly returns to the First Auditor of all fees earned during each quarter, to be made under oath and approved by the court; and upon failure to make said quarterly and semi-annual reports within thirty days thereafter, the clerk shall be summarily removed by the judge upon the request of the Attorney-General.

SEC. 10. That the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States and the judges of the Territorial courts shall divide each district into commissioners' districts, consisting of one or more counties or parishes, and they shall appoint one or more United States commissioners in each commissioner's district, as may be required for the efficient and economical execution of the laws. Such commissioner shall have jurisdiction only of such offenses as are committed in their respective districts, except in cases of change of venue or where no qualified commissioner resides in the commissioner's district where the offense was committed, who is in the district and physically able to perform his duties, and except also in cases of offenses against the postal laws of the United States, in which the jurisdiction shall remain as now provided by law.

United States commissioners shall receive for their services such fees as are now allowed by law, except that in all criminal cases heard by them they shall only be allowed $1 for issuing process to arrest and $1 for a recognizance or bond for court, including affidavits of justification of sureties and acknowledgments and for all other writs and processes issued, for all oaths administered, for docketing, hearing, and trying the same, and for all services performed the sum of $5, and no more, for each case; but where two or more charges not requiring separate trials are preferred against any person at the same time, the commissioner shall be allowed only for a fee in one case. In preliminary examinations, where there is probably cause of guilt, the commissioner shall bind over the accused, if he shall give the bail required, to appear for trial before the court in his district which may be held nearest the place where the offense was committed having jurisdiction thereof; and if he can not give the required bail, the commissioner shall commit him for trial to the nearest jail where such prisoners can be safely and economically kept, and shall in both cases transmit all the papers in the case to the clerk of the United States court having jurisdiction thereof, to be held in said district nearest the place where the offense was committed, at which court grand juries are impaneled; and the clerk shall notify the district attorney thereof; but any accused person who may be committed in default of bail may, upon the order of the judge, on the application of the accused, be removed to and tried at that place in the judicial district where the court will be held next after his commitment: Provided, That all such preliminary examinations shall be held and conducted by the officer authorized to hold and conduct such examinations who resides nearest the place where the offense is alleged to have been committed.

Justices of the peace shall receive the same fees as United States commissioners for services in criminal cases. Their accounts shall be verified by oath and forwarded to the United States attorney of the district, to be submitted to the court for approval; but no commissioner or justice of the peace, acting as such, shall demand or receive from any accused party any cost or fee in any criminal procedure until after the final conviction of the accused, when such fees may be taxed as costs.

It shall be the duty of commissioners and justices of the peace to examine and certify to the marshal for payment bills of witnesses for transportation and attendance.

The judges of the Territorial courts, United States district attorneys, and United States marshals and their deputies, when required to use any public conveyance in the discharge of their respective duties, shall be allowed the actual amount paid for transportation, not exceeding the usual fares on such public conveyance, and no more. All accounts rendered for such transportation shall be verified by oath of the person making the same; and he shall state in such oath that he did not use for any part of such transportation a pass or pay a less fare than that stated in the account.

Accounts for the transportation of prisoners and guards by public conveyances shall be rendered for such sum as was actually paid for such transportation, not exceeding the usual fare, and vouchers verified by oath shall in all cases accompany such accounts.

SEC. 11. That United States marshals shall hereafter be allowed their actual expenses in the following cases, namely:

For transporting prisoners in any State or Territory, or from one State or Territory to another, on any public conveyance, the amount actually paid for the transportation of themselves and for each prisoner and necessary guard, but not exceeding the usual fare. Where free transportation is used no charge whatever shall be made or allowed. If reduced transportation is secured this fact shall be stated and the actual amount paid shall be charged in the account and no more.

The amount actually and necessarily paid for meals of themselves, prisoners, and necessary guards while in transitu, not exceeding 50 cents per meal.

The amount actually paid deputy marshals and guards for their services, not exceeding $2 per day.

For travel in going to serve or returning from serving any process, warrant, attachment, or other writ, including writs of subpœna in civil or criminal cases, the actual amount paid for transportation on all public conveyances, and no more, the account to be stated as in case of transporting criminals; and for each mile actually traveled to serve any such process as aforesaid where there is no public conveyance, 10 cents per mile going and returning.

For all travel required of them by law on any public conveyance they shall be allowed in all States and Territories the actual amount paid, as herein provided, and no more; and for every mile actually traveled where there is no public conveyance, 10 cents per mile each way.

All allowances for travel by public conveyance and meals are not to be construed as compensation, but as reimbursement for actual and necessary expenditures in the discharge of official duties; and all transportation provided for in this act shall be computed by the nearest practicable route.

All allowances for mileage and transportation on public conveyances in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal; and no credit shall be allowed to any of the disbursing officers of the United States for payments or allowances in violation of the provisions of this act. An affidavit that the account is just and true in all respects, and that the expenses charged therein were actually and necessarily incurred, must accompany each bill. In all cases the account must contain the items of expenditure. The Attorney-General shall prescribe forms, rules, and regulations for presenting all accounts of court officials, to all of which forms shall be attached the oaths taken and subscribed.

SEC. 12. That hereafter jurors and witnesses in all of the States and Territories shall receive their actual and necessary expenditures for transportation when using any public conveyance, in lieu of mileage, but not exceeding the usual fares; and when there are no public conveyances they shall receive the mileage now allowed by law for travel to and from court; and witnesses shall receive $1.50 a day, and jurors shall receive $2 a day during actual attendance at any court or courts, and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same.

The Secretary having begun the reading of the matter proposed to be stricken out,

Mr. ALLISON. The sections from line 2330, on page 95, to line 3733, on page 111, are all legislative sections relating to one topic, and as I presume Senators are familiar with them as relating to a change in the system of payment of marshals and clerks of courts, it is hardly worth while to spend the time of the Senate in reading them.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. While I am up, if the Senator from Texas will allow me one moment, I think the debate on these sections will not occupy a great deal of time, and I move that the five-minute rule be applied to debate on all amendments now till the bill shall be concluded. I do not know of any seriously controverted questions that will arise. Does the Senator rise to speak to this amendment?

Mr. COKE. For a few minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. If it will not interfere with the Senator, I will move now to apply the five-minute rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa to postpone the motion until the Senator from Texas has had an opportunity to express himself.

Mr. ALLISON. I do it only with the consent of the Senator from Texas. Will it be agreeable to the Senator from Texas if I now move to apply the five-minute rule?

Mr. COKE. I have yielded for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas, I understand, consents to it. I move that the five-minute rule be applied to the remainder of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that debate on amendments to the bill be limited to five minutes, in pursuance of a standing order of the Senate applying to that subject.

Mr. HOAR. Can that be done by a majority, or does it require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be done by a majority vote. There was a standing order adopted the other day which provides that it shall be in order at any time to move to limit debate on appropriation bills to five minutes by each Senator. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to inquire if the amendment from section 2 to section 12, inclusive, is regarded as one amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. It is so reported as one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the reading of these sections, section 2 to section 12, inclusive, be dispensed with on the motion to strike out. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the committee to strike out these sections.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the sections stricken out by the Senate committee contain a change of the laws with reference to the payment of the fees of marshals and district attorneys and other Federal judicial officers in the different States. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment of the committee, which proposes to strike these provisions out for the reason that the change made by the bill in existing laws, as the bill came from the House, is exactly one that is demanded by the public sentiment of the State in which I live and which I have the honor in part to represent here, and so far as I know in all the States of the South. I can not speak for States not in that section.

I have introduced twice in the Senate and had them referred to the Committee on the Judiciary bills looking to the payment of salaries to district attorneys and marshals instead of fees, and that was the last ever heard of them. Bills to the same effect have been introduced repeatedly in the House and referred to the Judiciary Committee there, and it has been the last ever heard of them.

The reform provided for by the proposed law as it stands in the sections sought to be stricken out is universally demanded. Every other effort to procure it which has been made has proved absolutely futile and fruitless, and if we can not get it as it is in this bill past experience shows that we will never get it at all.

I will read from the report of the Attorney-General. For seven years, the length of time I have been a member of this body, annually the Attorney-General of the United States has recommended the change made in the sections of this bill which the Senate committee seeks to strike out. Every gentleman who has occupied the position of Attorney-General of the United States during that period has recommended it. I hold in my hand the latest report from the Attorney-General's Office, and will read from it on this subject. He says:

> The practice of compensating the United States marshal by fees is an expensive one. Examiners of the Department of Justice who have been detailed to examine their accounts report that, in order to make the maximum fees of the office $6,000 per annum, unscrupulous marshals in some instances through their deputies have encouraged frivolous prosecutions, outraging the rights of citizens, and involving the United States in unnecessary and excessive expenses.

Now, I ask the attention of the Senate to this sentence:

> It is estimated that it costs the Government $10 expenses for every dollar's emoluments of the marshal. Thus it will appear that it would be to the interest of the Government to give the marshal a fixed compensation, so as to remove all inducements to practice frauds upon the Government on the one hand or wrongs upon the citizens on the other. If the deputy were to be paid fees for executing process, it would insure the same efficiency as the present fee system, and at the same time relieve the Department of the extraordinary expense complained of, as the marshal would have no interest in encouraging such practices.

The same reasons, in favor of salaried officers, apply with even more force to the United States attorney. By law he is required to examine the accounts of marshals, clerks, and commissioners. It is, therefore, clear that the emoluments of his office ought not to be contingent upon the amount of business done by officers upon the correctness of whose accounts he must pass.

The interests of the Government would be protected in fixing the compensation of marshal and attorneys by taking as a basis an estimate of the business transacted during the past ten years. To protect the Government against paying excessive salaries in districts where the business has heretofore been worked up by the institution of frivolous cases, for the sole purpose of increasing fees, I respectfully recommend that Congress give the Attorney-General the authority, at his discretion, to adjust salaries of marshals at the close of each fiscal year, increasing or diminishing the snme for the next fiscal year, upon some basis to be fixed by law. In this manner justice could be done both to the United States and its officers.

Here is a recommendation by the law officer of the Government, not made this year only but for seven years past, that the very thing be done which is proposed to be done in the clauses sought to be stricken out by the Senate committee.

It is said that these matters should be in an independent bill and it should come from the Committee on the Judiciary. Such bills have been repeatedly sent to that committee, and have been ignored. I know that such bills have been repeatedly proposed in the other House and nothing has come of them.

Shall we never have a remedy for the admitted evils of the present fee system? The Government through its proper officer cries aloud for a remedy, and the people clamor for it, yet the Judiciary Committee turns a deaf ear to their appeals; and when the popular branch of Congress propose a remedy the Senate is asked on a technicality to destroy it—not amend it, but simply strike it out.

In addition to what the Attorney-General says in this report every man in my section of country knows that the unpopularity of the Federal judicial tribunals is to be attributed solely to the reasons given by the Attorney-General in his report for making the change proposed, and that is that for the purpose of making fees the marshals and the district-attorneys foment and instigate and bring about frivolous and vexatious prosecutions for the sole purpose and no other of making money for themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. COKE. I only desire a minute or two more.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the presiding officer will allow the Senator from Texas a minute or two more. I did not intend to cut him off by the motion to limit debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Texas be allowed to proceed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COKE. While instigating these frivolous and vexatious prosecutions against the citizen they are at the same time piling up costs against the Government, for the Attorney-General in the report just read declares that every dollar of the marshal's emoluments costs the Government $10. They are rendering the courts unpopular throughout the country. I have no hesitation in saying that while the salaries fixed for all the officers in the bill are ample, there could not be a measure passed through this Congress which would to a greater degree popularize the Federal judiciary than would this. I do not know of one that could be passed that would meet with so much popular favor as this would. Take away from marshals, from district attorneys, from deputy marshals, the only motive they have for instituting any other than a just prosecution, that is the fees, and you will have no other than just ones, and the public sentiment of the whole country will sustain the courts whenever a prosecution is instituted. But, as the Attorney-General says, as long as you offer a premium through the fee system to the district attorneys and to the marshals you will have oppressive and vexatious litigation, which will be outrageous upon the rights of the citizen while inflicting heavy damage in the way of expense on the Government.

Why should not the bill as it came from the House be passed with these sections in it? Why should they be stricken out? It is said it is new legislation on a general appropriation bill, which is forbidden by our rules. I can turn to fifty places in the bill and point out new legislation. If gentlemen want to know where they are I have just selected a few samples. On page 56, under the head of "Tenth Census," two-thirds of it is new legislation. On page 59, from line 1437 to line 1452, is new legislation. On page 72, from line 1766 to line 1770, inclusive, is new legislation. On page 79, from line 1926 to line 1931, inclusive, is new legislation. The bill, although a general appropriation bill, is full of new legislation, some of it put on by the Senate committee and a great deal more of it in the bill as it came from the House. If the Senate committee make no objection to new legislation as it stands in the bill as already adopted, why stickle over these sections which simply give what the Attorney-General has seven times recommended, what the public sentiment of the country demands, and what common justice ought to concede?

I see nothing in the objection that it is new legislation. If the Senate can take the new legislation which has already been adopted in this bill, it surely ought not to object to a little more that is so much demanded.

I have nothing more to say.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations struck out this legislation because it is wholly new legislation, and for the reason that it was not within its province or duty to examine into the details of twelve sections of a new measure reported not from the regular committees of either House, upturning and oversetting legislation from the foundation of the Government to this time. We did not feel that in the few waning days and hours of this session we could do justice to a great question like that, especially when such subjects are committed to the Judiciary Committee of this body, because we are not disposed to draw into the meshes of the Appropriations Committee room all the legislation of the Senate. Yet here are questions involved which propose to repeal and change laws passed from the foundation of the Government to this moment of time.

In the next place, I do not believe there are three Senators, certainly not fifteen Senators, on this floor who did not in one form or other suggest amendments to these sections, saying that injustice had been done to this district and that district, that anomalies exist here with reference to compensation and with reference to other questions involved in these sections. So the Committee on Appropriations, knowing that the bill must be reported within a few days and having this large mass of business to look after, concluded that, however wise a general revision of the fees and compensation of marshals and clerks and district attorneys may be, a system which had existed from the foundation of the Government could not be so wrong as to require us to remain here during the month of July to correct it. That is the explanation of the action of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to add to what has been said by the chairman of the committee, that while I looked with great care over these provisions and believed that there were many of them that ought to be adopted, I endeavored to see whether we could not take the legislation just as it came from the House. I took pains to consult leading members of the Committee on the Judiciary. They pointed out difficulty after difficulty and amendment after amendment that ought to be added. Members of the Senate and members of the House protested against some of the items in these sections, until it became painfully apparent in the Committee on Appropriations that if we undertook to correct all that they said was wrong the bill could not be reported for two weeks to come. Indeed, if we had done nothing else but work on these legislative sections from the day the bill was submitted to us till the present time we should not have been through considering the propositions submitted to us by Members and Senators. It was a question whether we would let the bill go, or whether we would report it to the Senate, and confess in moving to strike out these clauses that we had not time to consider them and that the Senate must deal with the subject.

We were advised and we knew the rule to be that we could not amend the legislation of the House; that any amendment suggested would be legislation, and therefore could be stricken out. We were told there were many things here that were wrong, and when we found we could not amend them we could not afford to report them back. We were told to-day from the chair that even in conference we can not amend House legislation by putting new legislation upon it to correct errors or rectify what was admitted by the House to be defective.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me, is it not competent for these House provisions to be adopted by the Senate without amendment?

Mr. BECK. That is just the trouble. On an appropriation bill the decision of the Chair is, and the Senate has sustained the Chair in all its decisions, that we can not amend legislation that comes to us from the House. If we could do that it would present a very different question. We can adopt but can not amend. That is the decision of the Chair, and I believe all parliamentarians are agreed upon it. I know I consulted with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], and others, who I believe are good parliamentarians, and I consulted the President of the Senate himself, I was so anxious to consider this question, believing with the Senator from Texas that there were very many good things in these sections, and the advice I got from all of them was that we could not amend them; and so what could we do?

We can not consider the proposition; we can not amend it. We were told by the Chair to-day that even in conference we can not amend it. However important it may be, however desirable it may be, there was nothing left for the Committee on Appropriations in view of all the difficulties except to report to the Senate that they could not consider the proposition, and move to strike it out.

Having done my duty, as I think, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, finding we could not amend it, I do not know whether I may not vote for the House proposition, right or wrong, hoping that if there is anything wrong in it it may be corrected hereafter; but as a member of the committee I could not do otherwise than to confess that we could not agree to it.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I sympathize with what the Senator from Texas has said and agree with him in the main; but the Committee on the Judiciary, who have had this matter under consideration since an early day of the session, have not been neglectful of it. A subcommittee has had the subject in charge and it has heard many of the officers of the United States who are affected by the measure, and they are collecting information on the subject in order to frame a bill to remodel and reshape a system that has been in vogue ever since the foundation of the Government; and the Senator from Texas will find that the more he considers it the more difficult it is to frame a bill on the subject.

I think I assert a fact when I state that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary concur in the idea of fixing salaries for these officers; but when it comes to graduating the salaries and comparing them and adjusting them properly, it is one of the most serious jobs any committee of this body has ever had.

When a bill of the character embodying general legislation has been passed in one House under a suspension of the rules, if such be the fact, and then goes to another House where it can not be corrected, I think it is asking too much of the Senate to adopt it. Rule XVI of this body prohibits amendments of this kind, because they are general legislation. No gentleman can examine this proposition without seeing at once, when he compares it with existing laws, that amendments should be made to it. I have heard from two officers affected by this measure in Arkansas, a marshal and a district attorney, each one writing a letter of eight or ten pages, complaining of the distinction in this measure as against him.

My hands are tied. I can not offer amendments and have these letters read here, because to do so would be out of order; and yet in good faith to these gentlemen I can not see this measure pass through without attempting to improve it so far as it affects them. One of these gentlemen, the marshal, was once a member of the other House of Congress, a gentleman who stood high there and stands high in the State of Arkansas; and the tone of his letter is very proper. He does not make a ground of complaint, but he submits facts deserving of consideration.

That is the attitude we are in. However just is the complaint of the Senator from Texas, with much of which I sympathize and agree, I can not now offer amendments to this measure, neither can any other Senator; and it is impossible I think for the Senate to agree that this shall go forward on a sundry civil appropriation bill, being general legislation, and that character of legislation which affects very materially the interest of the country.

The Committee on the Judiciary have done all they could and are still investigating the subject, and a subcommittee still has the matter in charge. I do think under the circumstances that these clauses should be stricken out of this bill.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I fully concur in what has been so forcibly stated by the Senator from Texas with reference to the evils of the existing law. The personal knowledge of Senators, the report of the Attorney-General, and the testimony taken by what is known as the Springer committee in the other House have demonstrated that under the existing law the offices of district attorney and marshal are prostituted to personal gain. These evils are universally admitted to exist, and they have been known to be in existence for many years. These evils ought to be remedied, and it can only be done by legislation.

Now I undertake to say that a large majority of the Senate concur in the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, that the salary system is preferable to the fee system for rewarding these officers. If that be so, then I think I can safely say that the essential feature of the provisions of this measure as it came from the House we all sanction. I do not suppose that we can make any improvement in the general provisions of the measure making a change in the existing law. Now why not adopt this change that the House has sent us to remedy the evils, universally recognized evils, that have been spread all over the country throughout every State of the Union? Why not adopt these provisions as they come to us from the House and, in respect to the mere amount of salary to be apportioned according to the labor of each of these officers in the different States, remedy hereafter any inaccuracy that there may be?

There is a pressing wrong and evil under the existing law. Great good will result from a change of the existing law in regard to the reward of these officers by fees, by fixing for them salaries. That is the essential proposition and purpose of the House measure sent to us in this bill.

Now, let us take the House bill as it is. It is only four months or a little longer before we meet again, and after having gone home and thought about this matter and hearing the complaints that may be made in reference to the operation of the measure, we shall come here next session prepared to make proper changes in reference to these non-essentials. Knowing as I do personally the oppressive character of the practices of these officers under the existing law and the great public demand and public necessity for this change, I do hope that, although it may be irregular and hasty according to the opinion of some Senators, we shall take this bill in its substance and remedy these immaterial matters at the next session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it right for me, as the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a word upon this subject.

The matter has been under consideration, as my friend from Arkansas has said, in the Committee on the Judiciary carefully, almost in season and out of season, for the whole session. We studied the reports of the Attorney-General, although the subject was not new to us in his reports; we got information from all parts of the country; and while it is true, as the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Texas say, that in some districts of the United States there have been abuses for the sake of making fees and unjust profits, I think it is safe to say that in three-quarters of the States of the Union any such charge or imputation would be unjust.

But more than that, even this House provision, or any that could be named, only provides for a salary for the marshal. He, in his district, be it great or small, does and must do nine-tenths of his business by deputies who are still to be paid by fees, and those deputies receive process not directly from him, but from the courts, the clerks, and the commissioners; and therefore the abuse of heaping up unjust prosecutions in order to get fees will only be scratched by putting the marshal on a salary and leaving the deputies on fees. There is no help for it.

The more the committee investigated it the more difficult it appeared to us it would be to make a change which would cut out all temptation to make fees in the way that is proposed; and if you put them all on a salary you must have an enormously graduated civil list with appropriations for it, and find it almost impossible to graduate the salaries according to the necessities of the case, and then hold out to the officer the contrariwise temptation of pocketing his money and not exercising any duty as a conservator of the peace and as an executor of the law. Those are the considerations. The committee could not come to a conclusion about it, because we found the subject one of such great difficulty to deal with in the broad aspect of the question as affecting all the United States and all its interests.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator will allow me to say that the Judiciary Committee can continue their investigation and make the needed improvements hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a very extraordinary way to me from the far up north part of the country where I live to legislate first and consider afterward. We have been taught in our region of country, and I think it is so in most of the rest of the United States, to consider first and legislate afterward, and not to plunge into an unknown sea of difficulties and dangers until we know where our footsteps are to lead. So it has appeared to us that it was far better to consider the subject until we could mature a plan, if it were possible to mature one, which would correct whatever evil exists without creating a greater one; and so it appears to me, with great respect to everybody else, that it would be enormous, if I may say so, to put on an appropriation bill a provision which as my friend from Arkansas says can not be amended and modified. I have probably fifty letters before the committee now from various parts of the Union asking changes in this provision. It seems to be safer to let the Committee on the Judiciary continue to consider until the next session what system can be devised.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that any bill or report hereafter will meet with just as many objections in its details as the one now proposed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not believe that the Senate on full consideration would adopt on the merits the proposition that has been made or the principles which lie at the bottom of that proposition. Whatever difficulties or evils or abuses may exist in having officers stimulated by fees to make criminal prosecutions, it has been found in nearly all the States of this country, and I do not know but in all of them, and in England, that the only practicable way is to allow fees, at least in part; and in no case is the officer paid simply by a salary. There are cases where the fees beyond a certain sum are paid over. They are now in the case of United States marshals and district attorneys. But having a system of fees, by which the particular service is paid by an appropriate fee for that particular service instead of hiring the officer by the year, has been found in the experience of England and of this country to be on the whole the best scheme, and I suspect very few of the gentlemen who have complained of the present arrangement as to United States marshals represent States where such is not the practice.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in private litigation between individuals the fee system is entirely proper, because that enables the court to apportion the costs for the service in each particular case according to the actual service rendered; but where the State is the prosecutor, where the State employs counsel to represent it either in civil or criminal actions, but particularly in criminal procedure, the salary system is very preferable. The distinction lies in the difference in the character of the employment and the nature of the service to be rendered. The salary system will be found to be, I think, the only one under which we can control the officers of the Government of the United States so as to prevent them from abusing the powers of their offices in order to make money for private gain.

The Senator from Vermont, who of course is a great parliamentarian and is our honored presiding officer, and for whom we have the highest possible respect in every regard, takes the ground, as I understand him, that if we should vote this part of the bill which the committee recommend shall be stricken out into the text of the bill, after that we can not amend the text. I must take issue with the Senator under our rules upon that proposition. If we refuse to strike out the subject-matter which the House has sent us as section 2 to section 11, inclusive, then that becomes a part of the text of this bill, and in committee or in Senate is open to amendment as any other part of the text of the bill, and under the same rules which control any other part of the text of the bill. It is very true that if the committee had suggested amendments as a substitute for this part of the text of the bill which involved new legislation, those amendments would be open to a point of order and could not be received or considered. But now we are considering this notwithstanding our rules. This is received, although it is general legislation. We are considering it, because we are compelled to do it in order to legislate. Therefore the House, it appears, can send us original matter which is general legislation upon an appropriation bill and force us to the consideration of it. The question now is before the Senate, shall we consider or shall we not consider this, shall we strike it out or shall we consider it? If we decline to strike it out and agree to consider it, then it is a part of the text of this measure and is open to amendment.

It may take too much time to get this bill into a shape to suit everybody during these latter hours of the session, but the subject is one of such great importance that I concur entirely with my colleague that it were better that we should have some crudities or imperfections in the measure than not to have any measure at all. What the country requires at our hands, and I believe the country almost universally, is to change the system from fees to salaries in respect of several of these officers, particularly the attorneys and the marshals. Why, sir, the country, I know, must be pained and shocked at the reports made here by the Attorney-General in respect to the frauds that have been committed upon justice and upon the United States Government under this system of fees. The officers of the Government have been going about making investigations, and they have made reports which are very painful in their nature, showing the abuses of the fee system by the different marshals, and sometimes by the district attorneys of the United States, and, as was remarked by the Senator from Texas, Attorney-General after Attorney-General has been asking and beseeching Congress that we should make this change.

Now, inasmuch as we have not introduced this subject into the bill, can there be any harm in our allowing it to remain in the text of the bill and amending it according to the suggestions made by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Vermont, or whoever else may desire to amend it?

Sir, we are under no necessity for the adjournment of this body which is half as important to ourselves and the country as we are under to give to this country a good system of law and to prevent abuses. I do not wish to protract the session, but it does seem that we shall never get to this question. I do not wish to make any complaint of the Committee on the Judiciary, for I admire the conservatism with which they proceed in the consideration of measures like this. At the same time we have got to take some steps forward very soon or else——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not care to participate in the discussion of this subject at this time, but I have received within the last day or two a letter from a United States marshal that is somewhat peculiar, and inasmuch as officers of that class have been not a little denounced in connection with this subject, I ask that this letter may be read as part of my remarks, giving the opinion of at least one United States marshal concerning the proposition now pending before this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES MARSHAL,
Keokuk, Iowa, June 26, 1884.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I see that Congress has passed a bill to pay a fixed salary to the United States marshals and district attorneys. This bill as passed the House cuts down the marshal's salary one-half at least, for under the fee system the marshal was allowed $6,000, provided he made it in fees, after all expenses were out.

Now, Senator, I believe the bill ought to pass the Senate for the reason that by salarying the marskals and district attorneys it will do away with a large number of prosecutions that are brought under the old system. There is no disguising the fact that marshals, deputy marshals, and district attorneys bring all the cases of violations of the revenue laws that they can find to be brought, as it is the only way they can make their maximum, $6,000. Of course the deputy works up the cases and they are submitted to the law officer of the Government, which is the district attorney, and he of course orders or permits the prosecution of them all, as he knows that it depends on the amount of cases and convictions he can get in the courts by the deputies to make this salary. You can plainly see that the gate is wide open for deputy marshals to bring a large number of frivolous cases and harass good citizens where they unintentionally violate the laws, for nearly all these cases of violation of the revenue laws by the class of men such as doctors and druggists, they do it in ignorance of the law. But nevertheless they are guilty, and as a general thing plead guilty, and it makes a bitter feeling against the Government.

Now, you may think it strange for a United States marshal that can make at least five thousand dollars out of his office to advocate the passage of a bill cutting down his salary to three thousand; but knowing, as I do, that the Government can save thousands of dollars by the salary system and that it will stop a large number of frivolous prosecutions, and believing it is for the best interest of the Government and the people, is the reason why I do so.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

R. ROOT,
United States Marshal Southern District Iowa.

Hon. JAMES F. WILSON,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, on looking at the provision which is proposed to be stricken out I ascertained that in the crudeness with which it has been framed the eastern district of New York is entirely unprovided for. The southern district is provided for, but the eastern district is not named. Both the marshal and district attorney of the eastern district have been here in person to inquire what it meant that no provision had been made for that important portion of our judicial system. They bring me the figures, which show that in the eastern district of New York there are a larger number of causes, civil and criminal and in admiralty, than in any other district in the United States. The facts in relation to this were all spread out and submitted to the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment which I offered and had referred to the committee correcting this error. I learned from the Committee on Appropriations that in their opinion they had no power to propose amendments to this provision of the bill and therefore no remedy could be furnished which would help out the eastern district of New York by way of amendment. If this be so, certainly I must rejoice at its having been stricken out by the committee and I must sustain the action of the committee in doing so.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I have no doubt that if the measure proposed by the House and now pending should become a law defects would be found in it. I have equally no doubt that if the Judiciary Committee, intelligent as that body is, were to present a bill on the subject we should find defects in that. I remember very well a bill in respect to the Pacific railroads concerning a vast sum of money, amounting at that time to about $97,000,000, was reported by the very able and distinguished jurist and statesman Mr. Thurman from the Judiciary Committee, and that bill has had to be amended. I remember another bill reported by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee to correct the evils in Utah, and that bill has been found by experience to be so defective that we have spent days and weeks during the present session in an effort to amend that bill. So it would be with any great matter like this revolutionizing a system. Whatever bill we may adopt we shall find, as time rolls on, that we can amend its defects; but in this case the point is to start on the right road, and the right road beyond all question is the road by salaries and not by fees.

As was stated by my colleague, in my own State the unpopularity of the Federal judiciary system there has resulted alone from the petty prosecutions brought about for the purpose and with the design and intent of making fees. In the northern district alone in one case blank warrants were signed by a United States commissioner and sent hundreds of miles up into the Panhandle of Texas; men were arrested and brought to Dallas, and the very able and firm and upright judge who presides there upon the discovery of that wrong dismissed the deputies who had executed those writs. I speak of that only as one instance. There are many others I could speak of.

Not only has the Attorney-General recommended this, not only has the Attorney-General stated that every dollar of fees that the marshals get costs $10 in the way of emolument, but the President of the United States has recommended that the fee system should be changed and the salary system adopted. In sending to Congress the report of the Attorney-General the President says in his message:

> They (district attorneys and marshals) should be paid wholly by salaries instead of in part by fees, as is now the case. The change would prove to be a measure of economy, and would discourage the institution of needless and oppressive legal proceedings, which, it is to be feared, have, in some instances, been conducted for the mere sake of personal gain.

When I make a statement as to the arbitrary, dictatorial, illegal, fraudulent persecution of the people, I am indorsed by what was said in perhaps better language by the Attorney-General and the President of the United States.

Let us start in this system. We have been in session for more than seven months, and during those whole seven months no bill on this subject has been formulated or presented by the Judiciary Committee. The time has come, in my judgment, when we should do something; and if we adopt this system, then whatever amendments may be needed to it can be made hereafter. I admit that amendments are necessary; I have examined it enough myself to see that amendments will be necessary. Whatever amendments may be necessary time will develop, and we can go on and amend it hereafter. But let us start in the right direction, and the right direction is to abolish the opportunity for this oppression of which the people now complain. Let us start on a line in which there can be no oppression.

Now, in respect to fees which the chairman of the Judiciary Committee says must be paid in the way of taxed costs in the case of deputy marshals, that is a matter which can be hereafter looked into. Perhaps a marshal can not look into all these matters; he has deputies all over the district whose accounts are brought up. The records of the courts in Alabama and in Texas and elsewhere show the wonderful amount of fraud which is practiced on the United States Government by the present system, and it costs not less than ten times as much as a good and righteous system ought to cost. For that reason I am in favor of adopting the plan proposed by the House.

If the Senate could amend it I should propose amendments, for the examination of the measure shows that they are necessary; but we are told by the President of the Senate, who is perfectly competent and infinitely better qualified than I am about the rules, for I know nothing about them, that we can not amend this provision. If we can not amend it now we can amend it at the next session of Congress. Let that be done, and let it be now adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the great difficulty about this measure is the manner in which it is presented to the Senate. It comes to us upon an appropriation bill. It proposes in the closing hours of the session to change entirely whole sections of the law relating to the duties, the powers, and compensation of the clerks, commissioners, and marshals of the United States courts.

Mr. President, not once but many times during my service here I have sought to impress upon others the danger, the inconvenience, of attempting in this way to deal with general laws by ingrafting them upon appropriation bills. It must be perfectly obvious to Senators that if the system is to continue there will be no use whatever in the creation of the various committees of the Senate, and that that committee which was intended to deal only arithmetically with the estimates for the expenses of executing existing law will become one grand committee, absorbing every function and every authority in the exercise of legislative powers.

Now, sir, it so happens that I am a member of one of the committees of this body, the Judiciary, that have been considering this subject, but have not yet been able to mature a proper substitute for existing laws. I do not propose here to recite the difficulties of dealing with this question of affixing stated salaries for various officials in different parts of the country when their labors and their duties are so unequal. I can only say that the attempt has been made, and it has not resulted in a bill placed before either House of Congress.

The measure itself as it comes to the Senate is not the result of the action and of the consultation of what may be called the appropriate committee of the House of Representatives. It is ingrafted in the last hours of the session upon a bill intended merely to find money to execute existing laws. To whom is it committed? To the appropriate committee of the Senate? Not so at all. The Committee on the Judiciary never saw this provision until it was brought back here by the Committee on Appropriations. It is a very multifarious provision, and it proposes large and sweeping changes. I believe many of those changes would be reforms. Both the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Alabama have not in the least overstated the gross oppression, the extortion, and the outrage executed under existing law by the commissioners and marshals in many of the States.

I do not quite agree with my friend from Alabama that the only remedy is legislation. It seems to me that a judge under whose supervision these accounts are to be allowed has it in his power and it is manifestly his duty to put his hand upon these gross abuses, and I believe in many of the States of this Union and those which lie farther north the judges would not permit for one moment the abuses which are reported and testified to by the Department of Justice and by every one here in this Chamber and elsewhere who has knowledge of the facts. There should be and there could be a judicial disallowance of these excessive fees. There should be and there could be a removal from office of commissioners who have abused their powers under existing laws and a removal from office of marshals and of their deputies.

I could myself contribute some facts to show the great abuses under existing law that marshals of the United States have perpetrated in other States than those that lie far south of us. The publication of yesterday by a committee now sitting of the other House shows that the pruning hand of reform is badly needed in this Department. But, Mr. President, how can we wisely move in this reform upon an appropriation bill? Our rules forbid amendments, and can it be that we should adopt that which is palpably faulty trusting for some future Congress to reconsider our action?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, while the evils of the fee system have undoubtedly been extremely exaggerated, it can not be denied that it offers temptation to irregularity and extravagance not easily resisted. When an officer is salaried at a minimum and is permitted to have a maximum to be realized out of fees, there is unquestionably in the ordinary mind an inducement which may result in frivolous and harassing prosecutions and in the attempt to secure emoluments that perhaps under other circumstances would not exist. But on the other hand the fee system has been approved by the experience of a great many generations as being the most effective method of securing honest zeal in the prosecution of offenders. If we are to assume that the administration of justice is to be confided to men who are qualified to exercise those functions, I think it can not be denied that human nature must change before we can make a radical transfer upon this subject with regard to the method of paying our officials.

There undoubtedly have been in some of the Southern States excesses that require to be remedied; but obviously the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware is the correct one. These difficulties can not be cured by legislation. The method would be to remove an officer who was detected in improper and excessive charges. The difficulty that is complained of will not be cured by simply transferring this account from one side of the ledger to the other, by saying that instead of fees there shall be a fixed and stated salary. That does not change the nature of men. That will not affect the administration of justice if the fountain-head is impure and corrupt.

Therefore it appears to me that the argument upon which this change is demanded is fallacious. It is based upon something that is sporadic and temporary and transient, and is in violation of the convictions and of the experience that have resulted from generations in which the other system has prevailed.

One point further, Mr. President, on this general subject. I doubt very much if there are five Senators who know what this vast measure contains. The bill itself, if I am correctly informed, passed the House of Representatives without debate under a suspension of the rules. The subjects in it received no consideration there whatever. I do not believe that one Senator who has spoken is competent to say what this part of the bill contains, or that it will be effective if we adopt it. But we are called upon under an application of our rules that forbids amendment and compels us either to accept this provision as it came from the House with all its defects upon its head absolutely as presented or else to reject it, to pass upon a subject that has been before one of the committees of this body for months with patient consideration, and a subject in which the difficulties were found to be so enormous under the proofs presented from different portions of the country that they have been unable to formulate a bill in regard to it.

It appears to me that a mere statement of the situation in which this case presents itself, no matter how great may be the difficulties that are to be corrected, is sufficient to justify us in agreeing with the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out these provisions.

I should like, if my time has not expired, to say one single word further upon the rule of the Senate to which reference has been made to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us have the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations striking out from line 2330 to line 2733 inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2755, to insert:

SENATE.

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to Mrs. Mary Ross, widow of James Ross, deceased, late an employé of the Senate, the sum of $51, due him for services rendered in the folding-room of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2761, to insert:

To reimburse Benjamin Durfee for money advanced by him and to compensate him for labor bestowed in the compilation of the tariff statistics of the United States (Senate Report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session), in pursuance of Senate resolution of March 3, 1883, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2768, to insert:

To enable the Joint Committee on Public Printing to complete the preparation, proof-reading, and indexing of the classified, analytical, and descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications, and of publications of public interest purchased by the United States for use or distribution, $4,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the final completion of the work, which may be expended as additional pay or compensation to any officer or employé of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "House of Representatives," in line 2792, after the word "the," to insert "Secretary of the Senate and the;" in line 2794, before the word "House," to insert "Senate and;" and in line 2796, after "1884," to insert "including the Official Reporters of the two Houses and the Capitol police;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives borne on the annual and session rolls on the 30th day of June, 1884, including the Official Reporters of the two Houses and the Capitol police, one month's extra pay, at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 9,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the year 1883 be printed; 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is here by reason of a misunderstanding. The report of the Director of the Mint has already been ordered to be printed by both Houses. I suggest that the resolution be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose that course will be perfectly respectful.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 2, 1884.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the report of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, and 13, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 8, and 9, and consent that the same may be stricken out.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with the following amendment, namely: Amend the said Senate amendment by adding after the word "Interior" the words "in accordance with said intercourse laws;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
H. L. DAWES,
RICHARD COKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
OLIN WELLBORN,
RICE A. PIERCE,
B. D. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to know what the amendments are of the Senate from which it is recommended that we recede. There seem to be two or three amendments from which we are advised to recede.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Senate from which the conferees recommend that the Senate recede will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Amendments numbered 5, 8, and 9 are receded from.

Amendment No. 5 was on page 5, line 18, to strike out "four" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

Provided further, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located shall, within twelve months after the filing of maps of definite location, as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowances provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, &c.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the request for the reading of the other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2800, after the words "of the," to insert "Senate and;" in line 2801, after the word "House," to insert "including the Capitol police;" in line 2803, after the word "who," to insert "have ceased, or who shall;" so as to read:

That all officers and employés of the Senate and House, including the Capitol police, who were employed on the 3d day of December, 1883, and who prior to, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2804, before "day," to strike out "fifteenth" and insert "first;" and in the same line, after the words "day of," to strike out "February" and insert "May;" so as to read:

The 1st day of May, 1884.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to leave the word "fifteenth" and strike out the amendment to insert "first;" so as to read:

The 15th day of February.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the amendment of the committee in line 2804.

Mr. ALLISON. I want the line to read "after the 15th day of May," striking out "first" and "February."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to make line 2804 read "after the 15th day of May, 1884"?

The Chair hears no objection, and it is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move to insert after the word "1883," in line 2803, the words:

Or subsequently by resolution of either House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if that includes the temporary employés in the folding-room.

Mr. ALLISON. It does not.

Mr. PLUMB. All the other employés?

Mr. ALLISON. I have another amendment to propose.

Mr. PLUMB. I am opposed to this whole proposition. I do not care to make any dissent here; but if it is applied at all I want it to be applied to everybody who was employed by the Senate or by the House at the time named, and especially those persons who were in temporary employment. We pay our annual employés a great deal more than is paid anywhere else in the wide world for similar service; and if we are to do something to raise the wages of the people we have about us by giving to the temporary employés something more, I shall not specially object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2085, to strike out the word "cease" and insert "ceased."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to line 2808, and ask him whether in view of the amendment which has been adopted in line 2803 there should not be an amendment in line 2808. In line 2803 an amendment was adopted saying "who have been subsequently employed," and then line 2808 speaks of the 3d day of December, 1883, as the time when they were receiving pay.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we shall have to insert "or subsequently" there. I will say in reference to this clause that the Committee on Appropriations heretofore and two or three times have reported against these extra allowances and have always been overruled in both Houses; and this time the committee desired once for all to make these allowances apply to everybody in the employment of either House in this Capitol.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not apply it to Senators and Representatives?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator makes that motion we shall consider it. I moved to insert the words "or subsequently by resolution of either House," in line 2803, and I think the words "or subsequently as above provided" should be inserted in line 2809.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to insert after "1883," in line 2809, the words "or subsequently as above provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "available," in line 2812, to insert:

Provided, That but one month's allowance shall be paid in any case, and the same shall not be paid to any person who shall receive one month's extra pay under the preceding paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 2797, after the word "police," to insert:

And the temporary employés in the folding-rooms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question about what occurs in lines 2796 and 2797:

Including the official reporters of the two Houses.

Will the Senator from Iowa explain to me what that means and to whom it means to apply?

Mr. ALLISON. I will do so with great pleasure. Under this provision of the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives the official reporters of the House would be paid this extra month's pay, because they are borne upon the annual rolls of the House of Representatives, but the reporters of the Senate would not be, because they are not borne upon the annual roll; and we supposed that whatever applied to the reporters of the House should be applied to our reporters, and the committee inserted those words.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, I understand that the reporting of the two Houses is done upon an entirely different basis. The Senate makes a contract with one person to do its reporting at $25,000 a year, which gives to that person a very large annual compensation, perhaps three times as large, taking it altogether, as any Senator receives on this floor. The House, on the contrary, pays to five different persons $5,000 each. It is a totally different proposition. I am opposed to the whole thing myself in regard to any of these persons, because, in the first place it is giving to them, already sufficiently paid, what we practically have no right to give. We can only give a gratuity on the assumption that there is some foundation for it which is in the nature of an emergency or an exceptional condition of things prevailing at the moment.

I am opposed to that, and I am opposed to it for this reason: I have observed for some years a competition existing between the two Houses of Congress as to which shall pay the more to their employés. If the House raises a messenger the Senate goes to work pell-mell to raise a messenger also and have it understood it can spend as much money as the House can; and there has been no branch of the public service of which this has been more true than the reporting of Congress. Whenever the House gives a sum of money to Mr. McElhone or somebody else as extra compensation the Senate rushes in at once and gives something to its Reporter for the reason that it wants to get its elbows into the Treasury just as deep as we allow the House to get theirs in.

So far as I am concerned I do not want to enter into any compensation of that kind. It is wrong. We are paying now a large sum for this service. I have not the slightest doubt in the world we could have this service rendered as well as it is rendered now—I speak with no disrespect of the style in which it is done now—for a less sum of money; and if those who are doing this service in either House of Congress will submit themselves to competition, and be willing to go before Congress and say, "We will throw up our contract and submit this to stenographers who are competent to do this business," I have no doubt it can be done for a great deal less than is now paid.

I do not want to disturb the extraordinary condition of things, but I am opposed to this constant crowding for a month's extra wages. What is a month's wages to a man who is getting $25,000 a year, as our Reporter is to-day? Is it one-twelfth of $25,000 a year? It is one-twelfth of $25,000 a year in gross to the reporters of the House undoubtedly, but is it one-twelfth of $25,000 to one man to whom we are now paying $25,000? Then it is about $2,500 to be paid him as a gratuity for what? Upon some theory that he is not getting enough?

As I said, I am opposed to it. We are doing these things. They are pleasant, of course, to do every year, but we are doing that which we can not justify ourselves in doing. The employés of the Senate and of the House, and especially of the Senate, are paid more than any salaried people in the world, I believe. There are more of them than there ought to be, and yet we constantly increase them; and they are paid larger salaries than they ought to have, more than we in decency and fairness to those we represent ought to consent they should receive. Now, we attempt to piece the thing out at the end of the session by a liberality that is begotten of that demoralization which comes at the close of a long and weary session. I do not think we can justify ourselves in doing it.

Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in lines 2796 and 2797 was inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion of the Senator from Iowa to amend as has been reported, the Senator from Kansas moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in lines 2796 and 2797 was adopted.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not agree with the Senator from Kansas that there are too many employés of the Senate. I do not think we have a service here even equal to the public wants. I think those who are here do their duty faithfully and well, and I believe that they are insufficiently paid. I shall not only not vote to reduce any man's pay connected with the Senate, but I will vote for the most liberal construction for paying men here who are doing their duty. I will vote with the committee on this question with great pleasure. Usually it gives me pleasure to concur with the Senator from Kansas, but in this instance I will not, and I shall vote with the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. INGALLS. It would be interesting to know how this venerable abuse grew up. We are doing with the public money what no man would do with his own. I think it is a very safe rule in dealing with funds that belong to other people to do with them as we would if they belonged to us individually, and I do not hesitate to say that no employer would give a servant, no matter how faithful he might be, thirteen months' salary for twelve months' compensation.

Several SENATORS. Service, you mean.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not mean service, because I should say that one half the time they are employed but three months out of the year and the other half of the time not over six or seven; and yet we present here year after year the astounding and inexplicable anomaly, when the service one year is three months and the next year six or seven, of paying men who have annual compensation thirteen months' wages. If they are not paid enough by the month or by the year, they ought to have more; but there is no sense, there is no reason, and there is no justification for this method that we adopt of increasing the salaries of our servants and agents here when we refuse to increase our own. If this is "sauce for the goose" it ought to be "sauce for the gander." If our servants and agents and clerks and messengers and pages are entitled to thirteen months' pay for twelve months' engagement, then we are entitled to it. We do as much work as they do, and if they do not receive what they are entitled to, we ought to increase their annual compensation.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me ask the Senator a question at that point. Does the Senator from Kansas believe that we do pay the employés of the Senate enough, a sufficient amount for their labor?

Mr. INGALLS. I believe that we pay more than the private employers of this country in any of the business affairs of life pay those who serve them. That is my honest conviction about it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is that an answer, when you consider the character of the service rendered?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana will not misunderstand me. I am not speaking in disparagement of our service. I think our service is of a very high grade. I think that our officers, our clerks, our messengers, all those who render service to us are entitled to consideration. I do not in any way whatever speak in derogation of them or their service, but I do denounce this false and vicious and pernicious system that is growing here year by year of paying for service that is not rendered and that can not be rendered until the number of months in the year is increased. We give, for instance, to an employé here who receives $1,200 per annum $1,300 by the fiction of saying that he shall have an extra month's pay. An extra month's pay for what? He does not render an extra month's service. If we do not give him money enough for twelve months' service, then we ought to increase his salary.

But that is not the worst of it. It does not apply to men who have an annual compensation alone, but under the amendments which have been adopted here a man who works for thirty days, a man who works for a fraction of a month, receives an additional month's compensation, exactly the same as he who has borne the heat and burden of the day and works for twelve months in the year, if that amount of labor is required of him.

It is unjust, Mr. President; it is inequitable; it is dealing with the funds of the people as no man who votes for it would do with his own money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in line 2796 and 2797 was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say one word in response to the Senator from Kansas. The Senator must remember that this is not a thing that originated with the Committee on Appropriations, nor did it originate in this Chamber. It is an affair that comes to us from the House of Representatives on this bill, as it has come to us many times from the House of Representatives, and we are obliged to deal with it.

So far as our Official Reporter is concerned, it is true that instead of paying five official reporters we have one, but he has four assistants, and whatever sum is paid to our chief Official Reporter of course is divided among his regular assistants as the sum is divided in the House of Representatives among five chief reporters.

Mr. INGALLS. But I understand the Official Reporter pays his own assistants, and they are not paid by the Government or by the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. He hires his own assistants and pays what he sees fit.

Mr. ALLISON. And they will be paid out of this fund, of course, in proportion.

Mr. INGALLS. Does this give his assistants an extra month's pay?

Mr. ALLISON. His four regular assistants will be included in what we allow to him for an extra month's pay.

Mr. PLUMB. Not necessarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider. [Having put the question.] The noes appear to to have it.

Mr. PLUMB. I believe I shall call for a yea-and-nay vote on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second? [Putting the question.] Not a sufficient number of Senators second the call, and the yeas and nays are not ordered. The motion to reconsider is not agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall reserve that particular amendment for a separate vote in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the same paragraph.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say that it so happens that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate has employed men for a week and discharged them; that he has employed men for two weeks and discharged them; that he has employed men for a month and discharged them, and has accommodated himself to the varying circumstances and situations, the contingent fund included, until we shall be giving by this vote an extra month's pay to men who served a single week. Of course when we come to give it away, and when it is money that does not belong to us but to somebody else, it is a very easy thing to do, but it only illustrates the utter viciousness of this entire system, and the Senate ought to understand what it is doing.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the amendment I offered. I offered it chiefly on account of the Senator from Kansas, to meet his idea that these employés were not included on the regular roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. It was brought here by a member of the House, and I presented it to the Senator from Iowa. It only illustrates the viciousness of the system.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2837, to insert:

For the assistant to the person preparing the general index to the Journals of Congress, authorized under the resolution of May 22, 1882, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Public printing and binding," in line 2853, after the word "million," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, maping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Library of Congress, and the Departments, including salaries or compensation of all necessary clerks and employés, for labor (by the day, piece, or contract), and for all necessary materials which may be needed in the prosecution of the work $2,000,500; and from the said sum hereby appropriated printing and binding may be done by the Public Printer to the amounts following, respectively, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Iowa to line 2846, a typographical error, probably, in misspelling the word "mapping." It will be spelled correctly if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert a "p" there, so as to read "mapping" instead of "maping."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Although we have passed over it, it seems to me there is a mistake in line 2821. I do not suppose it is intended to pay a clerk for services as "clerk to the subcommittee on accounts" $180 for ten days' service.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a typographical error. It should be January 1, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to correcting the paragraph by striking out after the word "January," in line 2821, the word "twenty-first" and inserting "first"? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2858, after the word "million," to strike out "one hundred and twenty-one thousand six" and insert "two hundred and eighty-one thousand three;" in line 2862, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" in line 2863, before the word "thousand," to strike out thirty-six" and insert "seventy-five;" in line 2866, after "Navy Department," to strike out "forty" and insert "seventy;" in line 2868, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "eighty;" in line 2871, after "Department of Justice," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" in line 2872, after "Post-Office Department," to strike out "one hundred and twenty" and insert "two hundred;" in line 2873, after "Agricultural Department," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty-five;" in line 2876, after "District of Columbia," to strike out "eight" and insert "one thousand and five;" in line 2878, after "Court of Claims," to strike out "six thousand four hundred" and insert "ten thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, $1,281,300; for the State Department, $12,000; for the Treasury Department, $300,000; for the War Department, $175,000 (of which sum $12,000 shall be for the catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office); for the Navy Department, $70,000; for the Interior Department, $380,000 (of which sum $10,000 is appropriated for rebinding tract-books for the General Land Office); for the Department of Justice, $10,000; for the Post-Office Department, $200,000; for the Agricultural Department, $25,000; for the Supreme Court of the United States, $20,000; for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $1,500; for the Court of Claims, $10,000; and for the Library of Congress, $15,200. And no more than an allotment of one-half of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended in the two first quarters of the fiscal year, and no more than one-fourth thereof may be expended in either of the two last quarters of the fiscal year, except that, in addition thereto, in either of said last quarters, the unexpended balances of allotments for preceding quarters may be expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2892, before the word "necessary," to strike out "absolutely;" and in line 2896, after the word "law," to strike out "or that is contained in any other report made by an officer of the Government;" so as to make the clause read:

That it shall not be lawful for the head of any Executive Department or of any bureau, branch, or office of the Government to cause to be printed, nor shall the Public Printer print, any document or matter of any character whatever except that which is authorized by law and necessary to administer the public business, nor shall any bureau officer embrace in his annual report to be printed any matter not directly pertaining to the duties of his office as prescribed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he would object to amending this clause by inserting in line 2894, after the word "annual," the words "or other." There are plenty of cases where the reports other than the annual report embrace matters that are required to be printed, and are printed by other bureaus. I move to insert the words "or other" after the word "annual," in line 2894.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves, in line 2894, after the word "annual," to insert "or other." Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 2898 to 2903, inclusive, as follows:

That hereafter the Public Printer is required to print not more than one volume each year of the decisions and opinions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury Department, with such explanatory matter as he may furnish, and to furnish to him not more than 100 copies of each volume.

Mr. HOAR. I see the whole bill is to be stricken out down to page 129. I ask if that can not be all treated as one amendment, instead of having the question put twenty times?

Mr. ALLISON. It is one amendment, as it relates to one subject, to wit, the redistribution of all the public documents.

Mr. HOAR. Can not the reading be omitted?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope by unanimous consent that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the reading of sections 2 to 13, at the top of page 129, be omitted on the recommendation of the committee to strike them all out.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make an inquiry before that question is put, in regard to what occurs in lines 2898 to 2903, inclusive. That evidently was inserted on the idea that it would work some restriction on the printing done for the First Comptroller. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he knows how many volumes of decisions of the First Comptroller are printed now annually as the law stands?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know the number of volumes now printed annually. I think the number varies from time to time, depending upon the industry and energy of the Comptroller.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that is a proper provision.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the provision to which the Senator calls attention; nor do I think the committee would object to it, omitting the last clause, which is:

And to furnish to him not more than one hundred copies of each volume.

Mr. PLUMB. This is either a public document or it is not. If it is a public document, of course the Comptroller is supplied with it liberally, I think, being given one hundred copies more than is given to any other officer. I am informed from a very good source that the Comptroller now gets for his personal use 2,000 copies, and if that is so, there is certainly an abuse that ought to be corrected.

Mr. ALLISON. There is here a letter among the papers which shows exactly how the Comptroller distributes the 2,000 copies. In form he does receive 2,000 copies, but they are distributed under the ordinary methods of distributing public documents. If the Senator thinks there is an abuse, it is a matter which I care nothing about, but on examination of the letter of the Comptroller, which I can not lay my hands on at this moment, I am satisfied so far as the latter clause is concerned that it ought to be stricken out. I am perfectly willing that the first part of the provision should stand. One volume is enough in a year.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the printing of one volume now authorized by law?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe it is directly authorized by law.

Mr. INGALLS. If the printing of the decisions is authorized by law he can very readily circumvent the intent of this section by enlarging the volume, and the result of this may be that you will have a volume larger than the Revised Statutes of 1878.

Mr. PLUMB. That would be obviated by striking out the words in line 2901, "with such explanatory matter as he may furnish." The observation I have given to these volumes is that there is a grain of wheat to a stack of chaff. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that so much of the amendment as goes down to the word "Department," in line 2901, should remain, and the words "with such explanatory matter as he may furnish, and to furnish to him not more than one hundred copies of each volume," should be stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless more definitely advised, I should very much doubt whether these decisions were printed by any authority of law. I question that very much indeed, and I should regret to see any custom grow up here by which the decisions of all our Comptrollers, and all our Auditors, and all our heads of bureaus, and all our chiefs of divisions are to be printed as public documents and distributed. Therefore, unless the printing of these decisions has the sanction of statute, I hope the Senator from Iowa will insist upon his amendment striking out this provision.

Mr. HALE. It is recommended as a restriction, not as an extension.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the recommendation of the committee to strike out lines 2898 to 2903, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the reading of what follows line 2903, on page 118, to and including the word "repealed," at the end of section 13, on page 129, be omitted, the committee recommending that it all be stricken out. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. Does that include the first paragraph?

Mr. HALE. That has just been voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It includes what follows line 2903 to and including section 13, on page 129. Is there objection that the reading be dispensed with? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out all the matter referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The matter stricken out is as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever the printing of a document is ordered by Congress, or by either House thereof, the regular and authorized number of copies of the same shall be 1,440, except as hereinafter provided, nor shall a larger number be printed except upon the special order of Congress.

SEC. 3. That of the regular and authorized number of documents nine hundred and sixty-nine shall be bound in sheep, as soon as practicable after the close of each session of Congress, and when bound shall be distributed by the Public Printer as follows:

To the Secretary of the Senate, seventy-eight copies, of which he shall deliver to the Vice-President one copy, to each Senator one copy, and to the office of the Secretary of the Senate one copy;

To the library of the Senate, twelve copies;

To the Clerk of the House of Representatives, three hundred and thirty-four copies, of which he shall deliver to each Representative and Delegate one copy and to the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives one copy;

To the House library, sixteen copies;

And the Public Printer shall deliver to the Secretary of the Senate or to the Clerk of the House an additional copy for each Senator, Representative, or Delegate added to the present membership of Congress;

To the Library of Congress forty-five copies, of which two shall be for the Library, and shall not be taken therefrom, and forty-three copies shall be for exchange with foreign governments, under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, as provided in the joint resolution of March 2, 1867;

To the President of the United States, one copy;

To each of the Executive Departments, one copy;

To the Department of the Interior, for depositories of public documents, four hundred and seventy-five copies; and one additional copy for each Senator, Representative, or Delegate added to the present membership of Congress;

The remainder of the regular and authorized number shall be delivered as follows:

To the document-room of the Senate, of Senate documents and reports, one hundred copies, and of House documents and reports, eighty-five copies;

To the document-room of the House, of Senate documents and reports, three hundred and thirty-five copies, and of House documents and reports three hundred and fifty copies;

To the Department of State, for transmission to the legations in the capitals of foreign governments, and to the legations and consulates of the United States abroad, twenty-five copies;

To the President of the United States, one copy;

To each of the Executive Departments, one copy;

To the Library of Congress, one copy;

To the Smithsonian Institution, one copy;

To the Public Printing Office, one copy;

And, in addition, there shall be printed four hundred copies of reports of committees, which shall be delivered as follows:

To the Senate document-room, of Senate documents and reports, one hundred copies, and of House documents and reports seventy-five copies each;

And to the document-room of the House of Representatives, of Senate documents and reports, three hundred copies, and of House documents and reports three hundred and twenty-five copies each.

SEC. 4. That of the papers and testimony in contested-election cases there shall be printed only as many copies as will suffice to supply the members of the House in which the contest may lie with one copy each, and one additional copy for each member of the Committee on Elections, and two copies each for contestant and contestee; and, in addition thereto, fifteen copies, which shall be bound in sheep and delivered as follows: To the Library of Congress, three copies; to the library of the Senate, six copies; and to the library of the House of Representatives, six copies.

SEC. 5. That reports of committees of a private nature, relating to pensions, patents, claims, reliefs, and desertions, shall be termed private reports; and there shall be printed of each and delivered as follows:

To the Senate document-room, for the use of the Senate, one hundred copies;

To the House document-room, for the use of the House of Representatives, three hundred and fifty copies;

To the President of the United States, one copy;

And, in addition, there shall be printed twenty-six copies of each, which, at the close of each session of Congress, shall be bound in sheep, and shall be delivered as follows:

To the President of the United States, one copy;

To the Library of Congress, three copies:

To the Library of the Senate, six copies;

To the Library of the House of Representatives, six copies;

To each of the Executive Departments, one copy;

To the Public Printing Office, one copy;

To the Smithsonian Institution, one copy.

SEC. 6. That of the public journals of the Senate and of the House of Representatives the regular number shall be printed and distributed.

SEC. 7. That there shall be printed of the following documents, namely, the documents accompanying the annual reports of the Executive Departments, papers relating to foreign affairs accompanying the annual message of the President, the Report on Commercial Relations, and the Report on Commerce and Navigation, 2,000 copies, in addition to the usual number; 600 of which shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,400 for the use of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 8. That of the abridgment of messages and documents there shall be printed and bound 5,000 copies, 2,000 for the use of the Senate and 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 9. That the Public Printer shall print and deliver of the daily edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

To the President of the United States, three copies;

To the Vice-President, two copies;

To or upon the order of each Senator, forty copies;

To or upon the order of each Representative and Delegate, twenty-four copies; said copies to be of the daily or bound edition, as each Senator, Representative, or Delegate receiving the same may elect;

To the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of his office, five copies;

To the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, for the use of his office, one copy, and one copy for delivery to each committee-room of the Senate;

To the Official Reporter of the Senate, seven copies;

To the Clerk of the House, for the use of his office, five copies;

To the Postmaster of the House, one copy;

To the Sergeant-at-Arms, one copy;

To the Doorkeeper, for his own use, one copy, and one copy for delivery to each committee-room of the House;

To the Official Reporters of the House, seven copies;

To the Library of Congress, two copies;

To the Chief-Justice and to each of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the clerk and marshal of the court, one copy each;

To the National Home for Disabled Soldiers at Dayton, in Ohio, and to the branches at Augusta, in Maine, Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, Hampton, in Virginia, the Soldiers' Home at Knightstown Springs, near Knightstown, in Indiana, the Soldiers and Sailors' Home at Bath, Steuben County, New York, one copy each.

He shall also print and bind so many copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as will enable him to deliver—

To the President of the United States, one set;

To the Vice-President of the United States, one set;

To the library of the Senate, for the use of the Senate and the officers thereof, thirty sets;

To the library of the House, for the use of the House and the officers thereof, fifty sets;

To the Library of Congress, forty-five sets, of which forty-three sets shall be for foreign exchange;

To the Official Reporter of the Senate, five sets;

To the Official Reporters of the House, five sets;

To the Chief-Justice and to each of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the clerk and marshal of the court, one set each.

SEC. 10. That the Public Printer shall, as soon as practicable after the close of each session of Congress, deliver of the laws of such session, published in pamphlet form, as follows:

To the folding-rooms of the Senate, twenty-five copies for each Senator, and five copies for the Official Reporter of debates;

To the folding-rooms of the House of Representatives, eighteen copies for each Representative and Delegate, and five copies for the Official Reporters of debates;

To the President of the United States, two copies;

To the Vice-President of the United States, two copies;

To the Librarian of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, fifty copies;

To the Librarian of the House, for the use of the House, fifty copies;

To the Library of Congress, fourteen copies;

To the Department of State, including those for the use of legations and consulates, three hundred and eighty-five copies;

To the Treasury Department, including those for the use of the officers of customs, three hundred copies;

To the War Department, two hundred copies;

To the Navy Department, one hundred copies;

To the Department of the Interior, including those for the use of the surveyors-general and registers and receivers of public lands, two hundred and fifty copies;

To the Post-Office Department, fifty copies;

To the Department of Justice, including those for the use of the chief and associate justices, and judges, and the officers of the United States and Territorial courts, four hundred and twenty-five copies;

To the Department of Agriculture, two copies;

To the Smithsonian Institution, one copy;

To the Public Printing Office, one copy;

To each State and Territorial library, one copy;

And ten thousand copies shall be distributed to the States and Territories in proportion to the number of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress to which they are at the time entitled.

SEC. 11. That as soon as practicable after the close of each Congress, the Public Printer shall deliver to the Secretary of State two thousand two hundred and twenty-one copies of the Statutes at Large of the United States for such Congress, bound in sheep, which shall be distributed by the Secretary of State, as follows:

To the President of the United States, two copies;

To the Vice-President of the United States, one copy;

To each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, one copy;

To the librarian of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, seventy-five copies,

To the librarian of the House, for the use of the House, two hundred copies;

To the Library of Congress, ten copies;

To the Department of State, including those for the use of legations and consulates, three hundred and eighty copies;

To the Treasury Department, including those for the use of the officers of customs, three hundred copies;

To the War Department, fifty copies;

To the Navy Department, sixty copies, one of which shall be sent to each of the following libraries: The library of each navy-yard in the United States, the library of the Brooklyn naval lyceum, and the library of the naval institute at Charlestown, Mass;

To the Department of the Interior, including those for the use of surveyors-general and registers and receivers of public land offices, two hundred and fifty copies;

To the Post-Office Department, fifty copies;

To the Department of Justice, including those for the use of the chief and associate justices, the judges, and the officers of the United States and Territorial courts, four hundred and twenty-five copies;

To the Department of Agriculture, two copies;

To the Smithsonian Institution, one copy;

To the Public Printing Office, one copy.

SEC. 12. That the Public Printer shall deliver, of all bills and joint resolutions printed by order of Congress, or of either House thereof:

To the President of the United States, two copies;

To the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of his office, five copies;

To the document-room of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, two hundred and thirty copies of all Senate bills and resolutions, and one hundred copies of those of the House;

To the Clerk of the House, for the use of his office, five copies;

To the document-room of the House of Representatives, for the use of the House, six hundred and eighty copies of all House bills and resolutions, and three hundred and fifty copies of those of the Senate;

And at the close of each session the Public Printer shall deliver to the Congressional Library and to the libraries of the Senate and House of Representatives, each, two complete sets;

And to the document-rooms of the Senate and House of Representatives, each, one complete set of all bills and resolutions of such sessions, bound in sheep, for permanent preservation:

Provided, however, That hereafter no bills or resolutions of a private nature, relating to pensions, reliefs, disabilities, patents, claims, and desertions, shall be printed except upon a favorable report of a committee of Congress:

And provided further, That when a bill passes one House as reported, the same shall not be reprinted in the other House except by its order.

SEC. 13. That all acts, joint resolutions, and concurrent resolutions in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert, as section 2, the following:

SEC. 2. That the Joint Committee on Public Printing is hereby instructed to examine into the numbers printed of the various documents, reports, bills, and other papers published by order of Congress, or of either House thereof, and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to report a bill, in December next, making such reductions in the numbers and cost of printing, and such changes and reductions in the distribution of said publications, as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and that the said committee is also instructed to investigate the printing and binding for the Executive Departments, executed at the Government Printing Office and at the branch printing offices and binderies in the various Departments, and report a bill, in December next, making such reductions in expense and imposing such checks as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and said committee is further instructed to make any other investigations calculated in their opinion to reduce the cost of the public printing, and report the result thereof; and the said committee is hereby authorized to summon and to examine experts and witnesses, and to call upon the heads of Executive Departments and the Public Printer for such information regarding the preceding matters as they may desire; and any expenses necessarily incurred in making the investigations aforesaid shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. Is not that section liable to a point of order on the ground of being general legislation on an appropriation bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make the point of order?

Mr. INGALLS. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. He thinks the section is not in order under the rule. The Senate will now return to the consideration of the amendment passed over informally on page 40. The portion of the bill on pages 40 and 41, from line 979 to line 1005, was passed over informally.

Mr. SHERMAN (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate now take a recess until 8 o'clock. I will say that there are a great multitude of amendments to be offered to this bill, and, unless we intend to weary ourselves out, we had better take a recess.

Mr. VOORHEES. Why not adjourn?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to appeal to the Senator from Indiana to withdraw the motion. It is absolutely essential that this bill be finished to-night if we are to adjourn this week.

Mr. VOORHEES. I withdraw the motion on the request of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn being withdrawn, the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives in which it originated the bill (H. R. 1015) entitled "An act for the relief of Fitz-John Porter," with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same, and had

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDNANCE AND GUNNERY.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to inquire as to the capacity of steel-producing works in the United States to make steel of suitable quality and sufficient in quantity to furnish metal for guns of high power and metal plates and other material for the construction of vessels of war and for the armor or sheathing for such vessels.

2. That said committee shall also inquire as to the character and sufficiency of machinery and machine-tools in the navy-yards, and also in private foundries and machine-shops in the United States, for the construction of engines suitable for vessels of war and for manufacturing guns for the proper armament of such vessels, and of the seacoast defenses, and for the purpose of constructing iron and steel ships of war.

3. Said committee shall also inquire into the best locations in the United States for manufacturing guns, engines, and armor for vessels, and for building iron and steel ships of war, and the best method of manufacturing and building the same, whether by the Government or by contract with private persons.

4. Said committee shall have power to sit in the vacation of the Senate at any place in the United States, to send for persons and papers, and to appoint a clerk and messenger, and may report by bill or otherwise.

5. The expenses of said committee and of witnesses summoned before it shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to be certified by the chairman of the committee, and auditedand allowed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, in line 986, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

For the State Department, $20,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, on behalf of the committee, now to strike out lines 979 to 1005, inclusive, and insert what I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed to be inserted will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

To enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, including the Department of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, to participate in the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition to be held at New Orleans, La., under act of Congress of February 10, 1883, to be expended under the direction of the President, $250,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BECK. I propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa by inserting after "in," in line 3, the words:

The Cincinnati Industrial Exposition to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, during the months of September and October, 1884, the Southern Exposition to be held at Louisville, Ky., from August 16 to October 25, 1884, and in.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Kentucky increase the sum?

Mr. BECK. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that strictly the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is not now in order, it being an amendment to what is an amendment to an amendment; but if there be no objection, it will be received for consideration. It will be read as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended the amendment would read:

To enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, including the Department of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, to participate in the Cincinnati Industrial Exposition to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, during the months of September and October, 1884, the Southern Exposition, to be held at Louisville, Ky., from August 16 to October 25, 1884, and in the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, to be held at New Orleans, La., under act of Congress of February 10, 1883, to be expended under the direction of the President, $250,000.

Mr. JONAS. I have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, but I trust the Senate will not concur in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to reduce the amount of the appropriation from $500,000, as contained in the House bill, to $250,000. The amount appropriated, I submit, is not more than sufficient in order to enable the different Departments of the Government to make such an exhibition as is desirable at this great exposition to be held in New Orleans in December.

The President sent in a special message to Congress recommending an appropriation of $588,000, if my memory serves me aright, for the purpose, to which the House responded by appropriating $500,000, and distributing it among the different Departments of the Government as they adjudged best, after hearing the needs of the various Departments and bureaus in relation to the matter.

The President has issued an executive order constituting a board from the different Departments of the Government for the purpose of preparing for this exposition. They are now making preparations of the most extensive character, and it would be, I believe, impossible for them to carry out the intentions of the President or to carry out the proposed preparations on the appropriation recommended by the committee. I think it would be but very poor and niggardly policy to reduce this appropriation now.

The exposition which is to be held at New Orleans promises to be greatly more extensive and more successful than the one held in the centennial year in Philadelphia, for which the Government made a large appropriation, I think $700,000; and Congress made a large appropriation for the purpose of enabling the various Departments of the Government to make an exhibition there and made an additional appropriation for the purpose of restoring the various articles exhibited after the exhibition was over.

I sincerely trust that after the great preparation which has been made for this exhibition, after Congress has come generously to its aid by loaning to its managers a million of money to enable them to carry out their programme, and has invited the world to this great exposition in New Orleans, we shall not now cut down the appropriation which has been asked for by the President on the advice of the heads of the different Departments and bureaus of the Government, the amount asked for being that which is actually necessary in order to enable them to make a proper exhibition at the New Orleans exposition as compared with that which they made at the Philadelphia exposition.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, if this were an original question, I think it might be doubtful whether it would be proper for the Government to appear at all through its various Departments at the exposition at New Orleans, but inasmuch as the executive and legislative departments of the Government have concurred in the policy, not only of countenancing this exhibition at New Orleans but have actually contributed a million of dollars to its success, and also have determined to make an exhibition of the various Departments of the Government itself, it appears to me that we ought to make that exhibition in some handsome manner, in a manner appropriate to the dignity and the character of the Government.

The small amount of $250,000 will hardly be sufficient if we attach an exhibition elsewhere in addition to that at New Orleans, because a very large portion of that sum will be consumed in transportation and in the packing up of the articles which are to be exhibited and unpacking them.

In view of these facts and that two other places have been added, I trust the Senate will agree to the original amount as it came from the House of Representatives. It ought to be $500,000 certainly.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I see in the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives that for the World's Industrial and Cotton Exposition to be held in New Orleans the War Department is given $80,000 and the Navy Department $60,000. Now what possible relation or association can these two military departments of the Government, that have nothing to do with the industries of the country, bear to the industries of the world or to cotton culture? I have been unable to see what these military departments of the Government, which have nothing whatever under our system to do with the world's industries or with cotton culture, can have to exhibit that is of any value in this exposition. I can understand that the Agricultural Department has something, that the Bureau of Education and the Bureau of Labor may have something, that the State Department may furnish valuable information from abroad, but what it is that the War Department and the Navy Department can have that shall justify the expenditure of $140,000 is a thing past my comprehension.

I think for anything that is legitimate the Government has embarked in this enterprise not as a spectacular thing, but as an encouragement to industry and a representation of the world in industry, especially in regard to the cotton culture. I would not limit that; but merely to represent what has existed in the past in the War Department and Navy Department as a spectacular show, I do not believe in.

Mr. GIBSON. I quite concur with the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BECK. It adds nothing to the cost.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 25, noes 23.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. JONAS. My colleague [Mr. GIBSON] offered an amendment to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not yet in order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. BLAIR. As I understand it, the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa as amended by the one offered by the Senator from Kentucky will distribute, if it become a law, $250,000 between these three expositions, which will be, in my opinion, simply a waste of the whole of it. The estimate of the Executive Departments, after careful examination of this whole matter, was that in order to do the thing decently and in order at all would require $588,000 to be applied to purposes of the Louisiana exposition alone. On reflection the action of the House reduced that amount to $500,000. I think it might very well be still further reduced by striking out the proposed show of the War and Navy Departments, which have filled the ear of the whole country with their clamor, for the reason that whatsoever they had in their several Departments was obsolete, and that they are in no condition whatever to keep the peace within our own borders. I do not think there is any common sense whatever in exhibiting this old navy of ours in the waters of the Mississippi or exhibiting on an occasion of peace any implement of warfare whatever. We should simply become the laughing-stock of the nations by so doing. That $140,000 ought to be stricken out of the bill as it went to the committee.

But when you have passed beyond those ridiculous and objectionable provisions and come to the appropriations for this great and peaceful exposition, it does seem to me that we ought to adhere to the bill as it came from the House, or to increase it, or to abandon it in toto. It is utterly impossible to carry this out in a way that will not make us the laughing-stock of mankind without at least the appropriations that are contained in the original bill.

Now comes the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, which I think must come from an enemy of the whole appropriation, to divide this already ridiculously small sum of $250,000 into three equal parts, it may be, and the whole would thereby be reduced. It seems to me to be an absurdity. To adopt this amendment now as amended on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky would be equivalent, as it seems to me, to the practical defeat of the whole thing. I hope that the amendment of the committee will not be adopted, or, if it is adopted, that the whole will be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair received by consent of the Senate an amendment in the third degree from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], and, if there be no objection, the Chair will receive the amendment the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] desires to offer, increasing the sum, inasmuch as, if the amendment as it now stands be agreed to, it would not be in order until the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to move to increase it, and the choice, therefore, if the Senate wishes to increase it, would be to reject this amendment on that ground and agree to it again with the sum increased. So, if there be no objection, the Chair will entertain the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to increase the sum. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair understands the Senator from Louisiana to move to increase the sum from $250,000 to $500,000.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir; that is my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I voted with a great deal of cheerfulness for the loan by the Government of a million dollars to aid this New Orleans Exposition. I am fully satisfied with the vote I gave for that appropriation. I want that to be as great an exposition as its promoters want it to be. I am tolerably safe in saying that I want it to be as great an exposition as the Senators from Louisiana want it to be. I feel a very deep interest in it, and because I do I am opposed to appropriating anything of any particular consequence for the Government to exhibit itself down there at New Orleans. I do not want a wilderness of waxwork, of things that are of no consequence to anybody, that illustrate only the red tape of the minutiæ that pertains around the Government Departments. I want that exposition to represent the live, active, business interests of the people. I want it to represent the men who raise the corn, who raise the cotton, who raise the cattle, who work the loom, and generally carry on the great business of this country in all its ingenious and other forms. To put into the inclosure of the New Orleans Cotton Exposition such an exposition as the Government Departments would make with an expenditure of $500,000 would be to put a blemish upon what may otherwise, and I hope will be, a presentable, live substance; and to send the Government down there with these different Departments authorized to expend the large sum of money provided for in the bill as it came from the House would add to that absurdity, in my judgment.

If the Government is to go there, the President of the United States as the responsible head of the Government ought to have a sum of money in gross, and he should apportion it out among the several Departments in order that they may go down there as a whole, and not each Department go down there for itself and by itself and with an ambition on the part of each to excel all the rest and crowd all the rest out. There ought to be a uniform governmental exposition, and that, if it is for any purpose whatever, ought to be simply and alone to illustrate the workings of the various Departments. Anything else than that would simply be out of keeping, I think.

I do not think the people who go there from the South American states or the people who go there for instruction or for pleasure from the Central or from the Southern States, or from any other place, will be deprived of anything if the Government does not appear there at all. I believe that the use of a great space by the Government would be an actual blemish upon the exposition itself, and therefore I would, as an original proposition, be opposed to the whole thing; but, at all events, if it is done it ought to be done under some responsible head, in order that the exhibition by the Government may be uniform, may be connected, and may be harmonious, in place of being as it will be under the scheme and plan as it came from the House—each Department for itself and the devil for the hindmost.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, the proposition is to appropriate $500,000 for the purpose of the exhibitions at New Orleans, Cincinnati, and Louisville. If that shall stand, it seems to me that there will be no end to the amount of money that we shall be required to appropriate for these purposes.

For one I never would have consented to appropriate one dollar for this Louisiana exposition except for the fact that in the most solemn manner two years ago we committed this Government to that exposition by passing a law directing the President of the United States to invite foreign governments to be there at an international exposition of cotton and the other products of this country. When we passed that law the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] stated that it was not the intent and purpose of the promoters of that bill to ask the Government of the United States for one dollar, and a proviso was inserted in the bill that not one dollar of expenditure should be made by the Government.

At the beginning of this session they came here from Louisiana and said that foreign governments had been invited, and that in the nature of things, owing to the misfortunes of the people of the South, this exhibition could not go on unless the Government of the United States would loan $1,000,000. When I asked a promoter of the exhibition, who appeared before the committee, what had been expected of the Government of the United States itself in reference to the exhibition, he said it was expected that the United States would not expend a very great sum of money, and he named $50,000.

Now, after this $1,000,000 has been safely put in the pockets of the international exposition company at New Orleans, they come back to us with a proposition of $588,000 for the Government to expend there in addition to the $1,000,000. Of course the committee have in detail what it is proposed to do there, and the committee were of the opinion—and so far as I know there was no division in the committee in regard to that—that these proposed expositions of the Government of the United States there were upon too elaborate a scale, and that they ought to be reduced or scaled down at least one-half. But with a small amount of money we can not, of course, in an appropriation bill say what shall be the exact proportion of the different Departments of the Government at the exposition in order to make it a practicable and presentable and respectable exposition, and therefore we said we would give one-half of this gross sum and put it in the hands of the Executive of ohe United States, and let him take the responsibility of making a presentable exposition of this Government at this international exhibition.

Now the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] puts on this measure a proposition to allow this Government to turn itself into a traveling menagerie. It is to stop first at Cincinnati and then at Louisville and go on down to New Orleans, when with respect to Cincinnati and Louisville there has never been an intimation heretofore that the Government of the United States was expected to be represented at those expositions. They are local expositions; they are expositions that the Government of the United States has never in any way or in the most remote manner committed itself to. If we are to appropriate for exhibitions everywhere in this general way, then, for one, I am opposed to the whole proposition. I would not agree to the proposition for the New Orleans exposition except upon the ground that the Government of the United States has committed itself to it and invited foreign governments there.

The motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] is to appropriate half a million dollars, and if that amount is to be appropriated, I am for, in a modified form, the original bill as presented to us by the House of Representatives rather than allowing this Government exposition to stop at Louisville and Cincinnati on its way to New Orleans.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have read by the Secretary a statement of the Louisville exposition before I reply to what the Senator from Iowa has said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE SOUTHERN EXPOSITION AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

LOUISVILLE, KY., May 26, 1884.

Memorial to Congress in regard to exhibits from the Executive Departments.

To the Congress of the United States:

The Southern Exposition does not seek from Congress an appropriation for its establishment and maintenance. The people of Louisville have contributed more than half a million dollars to that purpose, and they ask no assistance.

The Southern Exposition only asks that the Government of the United States will make exhibits illustrative of its several Departments in a manner becoming the dignity and liberality of a great and prosperous nation disposed to encourage the enlightenment of its members and the education of its people.

The greatest manufacturing establishments in the country have exhibited their products at their own cost; many educational institutions have exhibited their systems without asking any assistance; owners of some of the finest paintings and statuary not only freely exhibited their treasures, but made an outlay of their own money for the purpose. In the vast display of the Southern exposition of 1883, the only exhibitor who demanded payment of all expenses was the Government of the United States.

Nearly a million citizens of our country, who never had opportunity to see the National Museum, the life-saving arrangement, the Signal-Service equipment, the result of our national surveys, and the other machinery of the Departments, were interested and instructed by the Government collection at the Southern exposition of 1883. It was a course of instruction, however, the expenses of which had to be paid by the exposition company.

The Southern Exposition of 1884 is projected on even a larger scale than that of 1883. It will be within a half-day's journey of 11,000,000 of the people of the United States. As it was last year, so it will be this year, the largest exposition—save the centennial of 1876—ever held in America. A vast majority of this surrounding population can not afford more than a day's excursion, and to them the Southern Exposition is the great event of their generation, notwithstanding the greater proportions of the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia.

The munificent appropriation made for the benefit of the New Orleans Exposition induces the hope that in re-enacting the act of 1883 relative to the Southern Exposition, and authorizing the Departments to make an exhibit in the Southern Exposition of 1884 for the benefit of the millions of people in the central part of the country who can not afford long journeys, Congress will make an appropriation of at least $25,000 to pay its own expenses, as other exhibitors do.

In presenting this memorial the Southern Exposition desires to guard against jeopardizing in any way the simple bill now pending authorizing the Departments to make exhibits as they did last year. The appropriation is asked only as a matter of fairness, and it will not be urged beyond the presentation of this memorial. If Congress is not disposed to appropriate money for such a purpose, it is respectfully requested that the pending bill be enacted, and the Southern Exposition, through the liberality and enterprise of the people of Louisville, will pay the expenses of the United States exhibit.

Under instructions from the board of directors the foregoing memorial is respectfully submitted.

J. M. WRIGHT, General Manager.

Mr. BECK. I have had that read to correct the Senator from Iowa as to this being a matter that the United States has never encouraged before. The United States made a very creditable exhibit last year at Louisville, and the people paid for it. We are willing to pay for it again. We desire to have it there; we do not think we ought to pay for it; but on its way to New Orleans, the nearest and cheapest route to get there is to go in that direction. That is all there is in my amendment, that the Government exhibits shall stop in Cincinnati and stop at Louisville; at Cincinnati in October, and Louisville in November, and get to New Orleans by December, and there make the exhibit proposed. That is all there is in my proposition.

The Government had a large and creditable exhibit at Louisville last year which was paid for by the people there, and they are willing to pay for it again if it is demanded; but we see no reason, and there is none, why the Government exhibit should not be displayed at Cincinnati and Louisville on its way to New Orleans, as was done before. Bills are pending which have been favorably considered, and I have no doubt the Senator from Iowa will vote for them, to allow the exhibit to be made. There was not a dissenting voice to allowing it to be done.

Again, the Senator from Iowa is mistaken in saying that there was no division in the committee on cutting down the appropriation from $500,000 to $250,000. The bill as printed, and as reported by the Senator from Iowa yesterday, was for $500,000, and that was the vote of the subcommittee, if I may be allowed to say so. That was reversed this morning by a majority of the full committee, the Senator from Iowa himself being one of the subcommittee who reported the bill yesterday with $500,000 in it. The change made to-day was not made unanimously, nor with anything like unanimity. I was in favor of $500,000 yesterday when the bill was reported, and voted to report that sum. I am in favor of the $500,000 now, and have been all the time, and so have others.

What I intended to suggest was the same objection the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] made, that in the distribution heretofore made the Army, the Navy, and other Departments which have nothing to show which will educate the people had received more than I thought they ought, and I shall vote to place the aggregate sum in the hands of the President of the United States, so that he may get all the information possible and so adjust the matter that with $500,000 he can do the most good, and not show off Jarley's wax works, or General Washington in his old Continental clothes, or guns of the time of Henry VIII.

We are living in the present, and not in the past. I insist now that the State Department ought to have a larger sum, and I believe it will be quadrupled when the President has control of the whole affair. We are requiring our consuls abroad to report every month on the products of other countries, the fabrics of other countries, the raw materials that can be found there, and we were advised that our consuls were sending to the State Department and they would send for exhibition samples of the raw materials to be found in all the places where they are located. They could be put upon our ships and our men would see what use they could be put to. All that would be of great importance for future use, things that could be multiplied for the benefit of every manufacturer in this country and all the producers of this country. This is such information as everybody wants, and it is worth a great deal more than to know what sort of guns were shot three hundred years ago.

I want the State Department to do as it is doing through its consular reports now. Exhibits are being sent to the State Department and furnished to us in its reports, on which we are spending larger sums of money than is now asked in the way of printing and disseminating knowledge, which show the raw materials of all portions of the earth and of all the ports where our consuls are situated. Let those be brought as exhibits before our people, let them know where they can get them, what they cost, and this will furnish information that will be of practical value. I should be willing to vote the $500,000 for that purpose, if for nothing else, instead of going back to show old-fashioned guns.

The Senator from Iowa, in the great multiplicity of things in his charge (for he has had his head full not only of this bill but of forty others), was a little forgetful about the opposition made in committee to reducing the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. I of course stand corrected in reference to the division of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Iowa being again heard.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no; I do not ask that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GIBSON. I regretted very much to hear the severe criticism which the Senator from Iowa indulged in against the promoters of this exposition in New Orleans. Considering the reputation of that Senator for fairness it was surprising, nor was it just to the citizens of New Orleans who had given their time and services without compensation to this great public exposition.

Mr. President, what have they done that they should have given offense to the Senator from Iowa or to any Senator upon this floor? They have come forward as citizens of the city of New Orleans to organize a great exposition for the purpose of bringing the citizens of the United States together, and especially for the purpose of inducing the citizens of the neighboring republic of Mexico and the South American States to come to this country to see the progress that we have made in the various industrial pursuits which have engaged our people. This purpose has commended itself to all the States of the Union, and it has especially commended itself to the Federal Government, because the Federal Government has loaned to the exposition board upon certain conditions a million dollars and taken guarantees for its repayment.

Now, what is there improper in the Government of the United States making an exhibition in New Orleans? The Senator says that it has invited foreign nations to attend at this exposition, that it has taken this exposition under its own charge and keeping in a large measure, not at the solicitation of any citizens of New Orleans particularly, but on the motion of the representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States and of the Senators who are assembled here in this body. If the Government has committed itself to the undertaking, it appears to me that it would be in keeping with the dignity of the Government, and the precedents we have pursued in regard to other expositions, to make a moderate allowance of $500,000 for the purposes of the governmental display.

Mr. President, I hope that the amendment which I have offered will be adopted, especially as a certain part of it will be subtracted for the exposition at Cincinnati and another part of it taken for the exposition at Louisville. I would like that the whole sum should be placed in the hands of the Executive to be expended by him in the manner that he may deem best.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the trouble will be that if you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana you are traveling around in a peck measure and you will come back to just where you started, and what I understood the Senator from Louisiana to say in agreement with what I said, that he did not wish to have money expended for useless exhibitions and spectacular performances and scenes, will not be answered. If you put this appropriation at $500,000 you will get the same thing that the House provision has given, and the only way that the Senator can get this exhibition of the Government down to something legitimate, to something practical, to something that shall illustrate the industries of the country, that shall bear upon the cotton-culture which is the great object of this exposition, is to cut down the amount appropriated. But if after this debate you come back to the $500,000 to be distributed among the different departments of the Government, they will force themselves into this exposition and send down there and use up the money intended for the exposition, for things that in no degree will help the real spirit and purpose of the exposition.

But if we limit the sum, and give $250,000 or $300,000, then notice will be taken I believe that Congress does not want to spend any money uselessly, and I declare I do not see how the Government as a government can spend over $250,000 profitably and advantageously in this exposition. Most of the things that are done will be done by correspondence. You take out the bulky nature of the things that must be transported by the Army and the Navy, and $250,000 will go a great way, and it will furnish this exposition, I believe, everything that those who have brought it about could desire. So I hope that we shall cut out the useless that is hanging around this exhibition by keeping the sum down. We shall get a better exposition by that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations have been gone through with.

Mr. ALLISON. I have one or two other amendments to propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one part of the bill not yet disposed of, page 93, which was passed over. The Senate will now consider the reserved amendment on page 93, being lines 2271 to 2287. The paragraph will be read, beginning at line 2271.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 93, beginning in line 2271, it is proposed to strike out:

For salaries of United States marshals, $219,000.
For salaries of marshals' clerks and chief deputies, $110,000.
For expenses of marshals, namely, for transportation to attend courts, postage on process, and for fees and expenses of deputies, and of sheriffs and constables acting as deputies, as provided by law, and for pay of special deputy marshals, under title 26 of the Revised Statutes, $300,000.

And insert:

For the payment of the fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, $629,000.

Mr. BECK. The sum is $600,000 in the bill for this year for fees and expenses of marshals and deputies. Why the other $29,000?

Mr. ALLISON. The estimate for the current year is a little larger than for last year, and I have inserted just the House provision. I assume that they have been careful as to the amount.

Mr. BECK. It was not before us particularly, and I was not aware of the necessity for an increase over last year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. We passed over the clause from line 2281 to 2287. In line 2281, I move to strike out the words "salaries of;" and in line 2282 I move to strike out the words "and for transportation of the district attorneys to attend courts."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in line 2281, before the words "United States," to strike out "salaries of;" and in line 2282, after the word "assistants," to strike out "and for transportation of the district attorneys to attend courts;" so as to read:

For payment of United States district attorneys and their assistants, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, after the word "payment," in line 2281, I move to insert the letter "s;" so as to read:

For payments of United States district attorneys and their assistants, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move in line 2283 to strike out "$350,000" and insert "$375,000;" so as to read:

For payments of salaries of United States district attorneys and their assistants, and for transportation of the district attorneys to attend courts, $375,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move to strike out the subsequent paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa proposes to strike out what will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out lines 2285 to 2287 inclusive, as follows:

For compensation of special assistant attorneys or counsel employed under authority of law, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to go back to page 27, line 635, and I there move to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves an amendment which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 635, after the word "oceans," it is moved to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

For transcontinental geodetic work, including line of leveling between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. These are amendments which were agreed to after the bill was printed. In line 427, in the appropriations for "engraving and printing," after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After line 66 I move to insert:

To enable the President to continue negotiations with foreign governments respecting the establishment of a common ratio between gold and silver, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. If the chairman is through with his amendments I desire to offer an amendment of which I gave notice.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I have offered all.

Mr. BECK. After line 374, under "Life-Saving Stations," I move to insert:

For mules for use at life-saving stations, providing harness, subsistence, and stables for the same, $12,972.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on that amendment. It is not estimated for and is not reported by any committee.

Mr. BECK. I do not know who has to estimate for it. In the fifth and sixth districts, running from Cape Henlopen to Hatteras, the beach is of such a character, as I have every reason to know (and I know a good part of it), that they can not manage the life-boats by the aid of men alone. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], and myself were there last Christmas and spent a day in inspection along that coast. We saw the operations of the life-saving service and reported to Mr. Kimball the condition of it, and he wrote to the superintendent, Lieutenant Chaytor, who sent him an estimate of what was necessary. I hold the letter in my hand, and the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service makes this indorsement upon it:

JUNE 30, 1884.

I approve this and earnestly recommend an appropriation.

S. I. KIMBALL,
General Superintendent Life-Saving Service.

I offered this amendment in the Senate five or six days ago and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I failed to obtain a majority of the committee in favor of it. I was so thoroughly impressed with the necessity of it that it seemed to me those considerations ought to make it in order. I am not sure that they do not. I know the necessity exists because I saw the life-boats there, and two mules at each of the stations twelve miles apart would enable them to get the life-boats and apparatus there so as to save many lives which they now can not do. There were two wrecks in sight of us when we were there.

In one a number of lives were lost because the men alone could not haul the boats. At a cost of $12,000, from the southern coast of New Jersey to Hatteras, in North Carolina, the value of the service would be doubled. The men can not haul the boats they have. We saw them attempt to do it. We were there and stood by them and watched it ourselves carefully.

This is a very small expenditure and would add very greatly to the efficiency of the service. The report shows that along the New Jersey coast where there are residences they can hire horses and mules when they want them; but the coast to which the amendment applies is a great sand-pit, divided from the mainland by sounds, and there are no horses or mules to be hired, and they are dependent altogether upon what they have themselves. It is one of the most dangerous coasts in the United States. With this assistance the service will be doubly as efficient as it is now. It is impossible to perform the service now, and this expenditure of $12,000 will furnish them in these two districts, which are twelve miles apart, all the sheds for mules and the mules to haul the boats, which would be the best service which could be rendered. That is all there is of it. The amendment may be out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels obliged to sustain the point of order. It is obvious that the paper read by the Senator from Kentucky is not the estimate of a head of Department.

Mr. BECK. No; I do not claim that it is. The Life-Saving Service, I believe, is not an independent bureau. I do not think it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BECK. I am sorry for it.

Mr. MORRILL. By direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I move, after line 1115, to insert:

For the increase of the openings in the floor of the Senate Chamber, the lower openings in the roof, and the arrangement for the exhaust-fans to draw air from the corridors and stairways, as recommended by the chief engineer of the United States Senate and Architect of the United States Capitol, $6,000.

I shall not take time to discuss the amendment, but I refer Senators to Miscellaneous Document 103, in which will be found an interesting report. This is for the purpose of getting a larger amount of air in, and also having an opening on the top, after the late improvement of the House, which is found to be a very great one. I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. By direction of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, after line 2756, I move to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay J. P. Voorhees, H. G. Williams, and C. B. Lapham, clerks during the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress to the Select Committees of the Senate on Additional Accommodations for the Library, on the River Front of Washington, and Woman's Suffrage, respectively, an amount sufficient to make the compensation of each equal to that paid to per diem clerks of other committees during the said session, the sum being the difference between the sum paid to said clerks by way of compensation during said session and the allowance under the legislative bill of August 5, 1882, construing the words "during the session" to mean four months; and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated and made immediately available.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that that amendment was offered I believe by the Committee on Contingent Expenses and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLATT. It was.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore it is in order, I suppose, to offer it now. The Committee on Appropriations of course knew nothing about it, and it being in order for the Committee on Contingent Expenses to offer it, I do not raise the point of order on it.

Mr. PLATT. We have examined it and we think it is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. In line 310 I move to strike out "commencing" and insert "completing;" and in line 311 to strike out "ten" before "thousand" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

For completing the construction of a light-house at or near Port Sanilac, Lake Huron, Michigan, $20,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa makes the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. This is a provision in the bill, and my motion is to change the amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that no amendment increasing an item of appropriation is in order, unless in pursuance of the estimate of a head of Department, or reported from a standing or select committee of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. This has been estimated by the Department for five or six years. It has been in the Book of Estimates. The only reason why it has not been provided for before was because it was supposed a permanent appropriation, or an appropriation standing for small light-houses on the shore of Lake Huron would be applicable to the purpose. The Light-House Board, finding that it could not be so applied, after advisement recommended the appropriation of $20,000 for a light-house at Port Sanilac on Lake Huron, and $10,000 is appropriated by the bill. It is a small light-house, and when the appropriation is made it should be enough to complete it, which is $20,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Michigan please send to the Chair the estimate on which he relies?

Mr. CONGER. I can not. I was not prepared for any such objection as this.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is not in the Book of Estimates this year.

Mr. CONGER. It has been in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely.

Mr. CONGER. It has been recommended by the Committee on Commerce in former years.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that the committee sent to the Light-House Board for information respecting these light-houses and the Light-House Board returned three classes of lights, one indispensable, another necessary, and another desirable, and the light-house of the Senator from Michigan is not in either of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Iowa insists on the point of order the Chair will rule that the estimate of the Light-House Board, as he did in the case of the Senator from Kentucky, is not the estimate of a head of a Department.

Mr. CONGER. I admit it is not; but I know the Light-House Board has recommended it. It is in my own county, in my own neighborhood, and I have on former occasions attempted to have an appropriation made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will perceive that the estimate of the Light-House Board is not the estimate of a head of a Department within the meaning of the rule of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I had not said that it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not in order unless the Senator can show a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CONGER. I could keep the Senate here until next month demanding that there should be sent here the estimates of the Department for every one of these items, if I chose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That does not affect the duty of the Chair to sustain the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. But it affects somewhat the position which the chairman of the committee takes with regard to it in demanding that the Book of Estimates shall be searched and the propositions made.

Mr. ALLISON. I have the Book of Estimates here and I find nothing.

Mr. CONGER. I do not say it is in this year's Book of Estimates; I say it has been in the report. I laid this matter before the chairman of the committee and explained to him, as I tried to explain to the Senate, that there is no use in dividing a little appropriation for a very important light on the coast into parts of $10,000 each. If the Senate has any desire to make a light-house that is necessary there, let it give the amount so that it can be constructed at once.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan still has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I hold the floor long enough to ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very sorry to say I can not do so, because to do it would involve me in inextricable difficulty with other Senators.

Mr. CONGER. Well, I have simply to say that I do not think the Senator from Iowa could bear to be placed in a position of inextricable difficulty, and I shall not press the matter to his discredit.

Mr. BLAIR. At the end of line 2851 I move an amendment, which is recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor, and by their instruction I offer it. After the word "contract," at the end of the line, I move to add:

Provided, That the employés of the Government Printing Office shall be allowed leave of absence with pay to the extent of fifteen days in each year.

The original amendment as printed is thirty days. I desire to modify it to fifteen days.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa makes the point of order that the amendment proposes legislation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that I may be permitted to appeal in the most touching manner to the Senator from Iowa to withdraw the point of order long enough for me to state the reason for asking that the amendment be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to debate the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly; I thought there must be justice somewhere. It is seldom in the course of human events that a point of order has been raised against an amendment so comparatively unobjectionable as this is, and really possessing so much real merit. There is no reason whatever, it seems to me, why the point of order should be interjected here. The amendment simply proposes to give to the employés in the Government Printing Office one-half the vacation which we annually give to the employés in all the other Departments of the Government. The printers in the Printing Office give us our RECORD, they give us our public documents of every description, and we all know very well that on the face of the earth there is not to be found an exhibition of such great skill in the art of printing as is furnished by those same employés of the United States Government in the Printing Office in this city.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not like to be interrupted. These employés work by the day, it is very true, but they work continuously, so that they perform as many days' labor in the year as the clerks in the Departments who are paid annual salaries. They possess as high intellectual qualifications and a much higher degree of manual skill than is necessary in order to discharge the average duties of the clerks in the Departments. As I said before, they work as many days in the year and more. They work not only the hours which are exacted of the ordinary salaried employés of the Government, but they work outside of regular hours, oftentimes a whole night, in order to give us the necessary printing to enable us to transact the public business.

It is only just that those men should have some vacation. Many of them are obliged to visit their homes. They do so at their own expense. Annually most of them are obliged to go home. We know how it is, and I may as well state that nearly every one of these men is expected to perform the annual journey to the ballot-box. They do that in common with the other employés in the Departments, and they do it at their own expense.

It does seem to me that in order to treat these men with anything like average justice, in order to give them anything like the consideration which we have to-day on the floor of the Senate shown to the employés of the Senate as well as to the average salaried officer of the Government and clerk of the Government, we ought to be willing to give them this fifteen days' vacation. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa, for nobody else in the Senate will raise that point if he does not.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall.

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal also to the Senator from Kansas, and if he will be quiet I will agree with him on his pleuro-pneumonia bill the next time. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his point of order and let this little amendment that has so much good in it be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know but that I still have the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Certainly, sir; I was only governing myself by the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will suspend if the Senator from New Hampshire has not completed his remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. [After a pause.] I see the Senator from Iowa is incorrigible and inexorable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. After line 280, I move to insert:

For establishing a small light and fog signal on Killick Shoal, in Chincoteague Bay, Virginia, $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood the Chair to say a while ago that an amendment was in order which had been reported from a standing or select committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reported from a committee and referred one day before its offering in the Senate to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; that is the case with this amendment exactly. It was reported from the Committee on Commerce. Besides that it is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in a paper I have here, and accompanying which are the recommendations of the Light-House Board as a board, and then it is signed by each member of it. I think the amendment perhaps did not get to the Committee on Appropriations in time for them to consider it, though they had a day's notice of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the point of order I made does not lie against this amendment. The committee did have it before them. It was regularly referred to the committee. I had forgotten for the moment that it was reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE. I think it came within the rule of the committee generally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the point of order does not lie. I do not wish to withdraw it if I can make it good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to state that this amendment has been reported from the Committee on Commerce and referred one day previous to this to the Committee on Appropriations, in which case it is in order under the rules.

Mr. ALLISON. It came to the Committee on Appropriations a day or two ago from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to say in support of the amendment that I have a recommendation here from the Secretary of the Treasury, one from Admiral Rowan, and a recommendation from all the members of the Light-House Board. This is simply an amendment providing for the construction of a fog-signal on a bay in which there is a channel which is dangerous at all seasons of the year and through which the Old Dominion Steamship Company run a daily line of steamers. It has been recommended, I repeat, by the Light-House Board, each member of it, and then by the board, as reported.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I think this comes under the rule the Committee on Appropriations adopted, that where a regular estimate was sent by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee on Commerce had reported the amendment favorably and it was sent in due time to the Committee on Appropriations, it should go on the bill. I hope no objection will be made to its going on the bill, as it comes within the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAHONE. In line 119, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty-two;" so as to read:

For court-house and post-office at Harrisonburgh, Va.: For completion of building, $52,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not now in order, it being an amendment to an amendment already agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order on it.

Mr. MAHONE. Where is the amendment already agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Line 119, if the Chair understands the Senator correctly, is an amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations which has been agreed to inserting $25,000 for this court-house. It is not in order therefore, if it were otherwise within the rule, to move to increase the amount until the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. MAHONE. Then I shall withhold the amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am instructed by the Joint Committee of the two Houses of Congress on the Library, after line 2257, to move to insert:

To pay Theophilus Fisk Mills for preparing a plaster cast of the face of, and for all work done by him upon, an equestrian statue of the late Secretary of War, General John A. Rawlins, $2,500.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order upon that amendment. It is a claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa makes the point of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know whether the amendment is open to an objection of that kind or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was the amendment reported from a committee?

Mr. VOORHEES. It has been reported and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and as I understood from the committee it was to be allowed to be offered as I am offering it now. I had no direct communication with the chairman, but the objection surprises me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What day was the amendment reported from the Committee on the Library?

Mr. VOORHEES. Two or three days ago. I will state frankly—and the best way to deal with these matters is to state frankly—this was referred some years ago to the Committee on the Library, and I confess that I never obtained all the facts myself until the present session, possibly because the gentleman to whom this appropriation goes is a better artist than he is a man of worldly affairs. This matter, however, has been investigated in the last two or three months, and if the Chair will pardon me for speaking of it, it went to the hands of Judge NUTTING, a member of the House from New York, and a most careful man——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator. No reference to a member of the House is in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought this afternoon some things were said on the floor that the present occupant, if he had been in the chair, would have suspended, but I am perfectly willing to be suspended upon that point. I would say, however, that this matter has been carefully investigated by a subcommittee of the Joint Committee on the Library of the two Houses. It was brought into a full meeting not more than two or three days ago. I can not quite recall the time, possibly it was Monday afternoon. There were present the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is the chairman of the Library Commitee, of this body, and consequently the chairman of the joint committee of the two Houses when meeting in session, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and myself, and the members of the House—may I name them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not under the rule.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I shall not, of course. It was unanimously agreed under the circumstances that this man ought to be paid $2,500 for work which he had done by employment, first by Quartermaster-General Meigs, substantiated by General Grant, then President of the United States, and incidentally and more than incidentally afterward by a joint resolution of both branches of Congress, work done in good faith, of which there can be no question. The only question is that this is not enough. Under these circumstances the joint committee of both branches of Congress unanimously instructed me to offer this amendment and have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations as an amendment to the sundry civil bill. I did so. I understood from the committee that while they did not put it in the bill, there would be no point of order made upon its being presented now.

I wish to say but a single word further. General Rawlins died in September, 1869. When he died General Meigs employed this man, who is the son of Clark Mills, an artist of merit, and who is as incompetent a man to take care of his worldly affairs as I ever knew, to take a cast of the dead man's face. He did so, carefully and well. These things are all testified to; they are all in the record. In July following the Congress of the United States passed a resolution which looked to the construction of an equestrian statue by virtue of the cast then made. This man went on and for two years worked in this Capitol in good faith to carry out what he thought was a valid and binding contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Indiana has expired in support of his amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me but one moment more. I am frank enough to say that technically his claim might be defeated, but equitably and upon merit it ought to be paid.

Mr. ALLISON. I think this clearly comes within the provision of the rule regarding claims, but it seems to me on the merits of the case that $2,500 for the mere taking of the likeness or face of General Rawlins is a pretty liberal appropriation.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, the Senator from Iowa does not——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa say the amendment was not referred one day previous to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order that it is a claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A private claim?

Mr. ALLISON. A private claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that it is a private claim.

Mr. PLUMB. After line 2022, I move to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay claim 22580, of Charles Wagner, allowed by the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department, $380.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is a private claim.

Mr. MILLER, of California. After line 66, I move to add:

To pay the expenses of representatives of the United States to the conference of the Red Cross Association to be held at Geneva on the 1st of September next, said representatives to be appointed by the President, $2,000.

This amendment was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. After line 2761, I move to insert:

To pay W. C. Frye, assistant conductor of the elevator, $198.33, being the difference between the pay of laborer and that of skilled laborer from October 15, 1883, to June 30, 1884.

Mr. MORGAN. That claim is a just one. Mr. Frye is one of the employés of the Senate. When I first came here he was a page in the Senate, and after he got too old for his station he became a laborer down in the engineer' sroom and worked very faithfully indeed. Afterward he got a little promotion by being put in service as a skilled laborer, as an assistant to the elevator-man. He has a small account, $185, or something of that sort, which the Senate really owes him for this service. The claim is not only meritorious, but it is needed by the young man in assisting and supporting his widowed mother. I hope the Senate will not object to giving him this little allowance. He has earned it fairly.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAHONE. After line 1115, I move to insert:

For cleaning the outside marble walls of the House and Senate wings of the Capitol, and the approaches thereto, $3,000. And hereafter it shall be the duty of the Architect to clean and keep in proper order the exterior of the Capitol.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. In line 1196, before the word "dollar," in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the office of the Surgeon-General of Washington Territory, I move to strike out "one thousand five hundred" and insert "two thousand."

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. What is the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. It increases the appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to hear what the point of order is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is that it increases an item of appropriation.

Mr. DOLPH. It is estimated for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will report the estimate.

Mr. DOLPH. The estimate is found on page 195 under the head of "contingent expenses, office of surveyor-general of Washington," $2,500. The amount appropriated by the bill is $1,500. I also have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office addressed to the surveyor-general of Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please send to the Chair the estimate. [After examining the Book of Estimates.] The Chair overrules the point of order. The amendment appears to be in conformity with the estimate.

Mr. DOLPH. I dislike very much to be compelled to do so, but I feel compelled to offer an amendment or two to the bill at this late hour.

Last September the office of the surveyor-general of Washington Territory was burned with all its contents. The bill appropriates $21,000 to replace the records, and it is estimated that it will cost $60,000 to replace the records, maps, and other property of the United States burned at that time. Besides the loss to the United States it was a great inconvenience to the community. There are numerous suits pending which have to be delayed until copies of the field-notes of the official surveys can be obtained. The surveyor-general reports that the present office is still more exposed to fire and more liable to destruction than the former office. The town is a wood-built town. There are very few if any brick buildings in it. It is the city of Olympia, in Washington Territory. He now has an offer from a party who is to put up a brick building to provide a set of offices for the General Land Office in it.

The appropriation of $1,500 made by this bill will not enable him to accept the offer. It allows less than $500 for rent, after paying for printing, fuel, postage, and other incidental expenses. This $500 additional will enable him to secure offices in which the Government property will be safe. If any Senator had his own property of like value exposed in such an office as is now occupied by the surveyor-general and had the opportunity at this additional cost to provide this additional security he would do it. All I ask is that the Senate will exercise the same good judgment in regard to protecting the property of the United States that each Senator would exercise in regard to his own property under like circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. After the word "dollars," in line 1726, I move to insert:

To rebuild at Vancouver, the headquarters of the Military Department of the Columbia, barracks and quarters, old and rotten, and that have been inspected and condemned, in order to accommodate a garrison of one regiment of infantry and a battery of light artillery, $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. If that was estimated for I suppose it is in order, but we have appropriated $200,000 in the bill, a portion of which the Secretary of War can use at that place if he thinks it would be wise to apply the money to it, and we have also appropriated largely in a former appropriation bill for barracks and quarters. I hope the Senator from Oregon will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I must insist on submitting the amendment to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. DOLPH. But I shall be very brief in what I have to say about it. The appropriation of $200,000 for the erection of buildings at military posts contained in this bill as it came from the House was designated to be expended for building barracks at certain posts named. I have not the remotest idea that unless an especial appropriation is made for the construction of barracks at Vancouver any portion of the appropriation will be expended there. I submit herewith a statement of the appropriations made in the last ten years for the construction of barracks east of the Rocky Mountains:

Posts.	Date.	Amount.	Character of Congressional bill.
On the Yellowstone and Musselshell Rivers, Montana	June 22, 1876	$200,000	Special.
At El Paso, Tex	Feb. 12, 1879	40,000	Special.
Milk River, Montana	June 19, 1878	100,000	Regular.
Fort Snelling, Minn	May 14, 1879	100,000	Sundry civil service.
Madison Barracks, New York	May 14, 1879	25,000	Sundry civil service.
Pagosa Springs, Colo	May 14, 1879	40,000	Sundry civil service.
Niobrara, Nebr	June 30, 1879	50,000	Regular.
Musselshell, Dak	May 17, 1880	50,000	Regular.
At the foot-hills near the Black Hills, Wyoming	June 19, 1878	100,000	Regular.

In appropriations amounting to something over $600,000, not one dollar has been expended on the Pacific coast. The barracks at Vancouver were constructed thirty-five years ago, and they were log houses. General Miles reports that they have become rotten inside and out, and are really untenable and dangerous to the health of the soldiers who are compelled to occupy them. We are appropriating millions of dollars for pensions to soldiers who became disabled during the war, and I think we can afford to expend a few thousand dollars for the purpose of giving them tenable quarters, at least quarters which will not be dangerous to their health. I ask the Secretary to read what is stated in an official letter of General Miles, dated January 29, 1884, to the assistant adjutant-general of the division of the Pacific in regard to the Vancouver Barracks. It is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paragraph will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Vancouver Barracks, Wash., is in many respects the most important of all posts named for permanent maintenance. It is situated near Portland, Oreg., the center of the transportation system of the Pacific Northwest. It is now and must long remain the most economical point in the department at which troops can be sheltered, fed, and clothed; in short, it is the natural depot, so far as this department is concerned, for troops of all arms of the service except cavalry.

Its garrison, fully equipped for field service, can be moved to all points in the department quicker than from any other post. A command stationed there is required as a reserve for the department, and it should be strongly garrisoned, substantially and comfortably built, and, so long as the service of troops may be required in this part of the country, maintained in the highest practicable state of efficiency.

The post was established in 1849. During that and the subsequent few years many log buildings now in use were constructed. In this humid climate the decay of exposed wooden structures is exceptionally rapid. In the lapse of thirty-odd years the log buildings referred to have rotted inside and out, and have settled out of shape; the pernicious odor of decayed wood permeates them, rendering them obnoxious in every way, but especially dangerous to health. It would be a waste of public money to attempt their repair. They should be torn down and the rotten lumber burned or destroyed. Fifty-five thousand dollars is required to rebuild this post for the accommodation of one regiment of infantry and one battery of light artillery. By the judicious expenditure of this sum the post can be placed in desirably habitable condition for the next thirty years, and it should be done at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer, by authority from the Committee on the Library, an amendment which was submitted in due time and referred to the Committee on Appropriations as an amendment to the sundry civil bill. After line 2257 I move to insert:

For the purchase of 1,000 copies of the work entitled Original Portraits of Washington, by Elizabeth Bryant Johnston, to be distributed to public libraries under the orders of the Senate, $12,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, a single word. I should be glad if I was prepared to say for this work what ought to be said. It is a great work, and I have intended during the entire session when the matter came before the Senate to speak what ought to be spoken for it. It embraces not only the correct portraits but the history of them from the earliest portrait taken of General Washington to his death. I know but one other work in the history of public men like it. It has enlisted the warmest approbation of the men of the highest literary note in this country. It comes before the Senate with the full approbation of the Committee on the Library, who have had it before them for weeks and months. It embraces only the purchase of a thousand copies, to be distributed under the order of the Senate.

I state to the Senate, after some service here and possibly some claim upon the Senate for candor, that there is no work that has emanated from the press for years past of so much value as this work which we propose to purchase. It ought to go to the public libraries, it ought to go to the various libraries of the country, where it would be hailed as one of the great instructors and teachers of the public mind. I only regret that I had not prepared something more worthy to say of this great and magnificent work than I say now.

This amendment emanated from the Committee on the Library and was offered in due time, and I hope no exception will be taken to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 20—no quorum voting.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let us have the yeas and nays. That is equal to a call of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SEWELL. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and therefore I shall vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Beck,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Blair,	Garland,	Lamar,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Harris,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson.
Conger,	Hill,	Morgan,

NAYS—18.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Mahone,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Groome,	Pendleton,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Platt,	Vance.
Coke,	Jonas,	Plumb,
Dolph,	McMillan,	Pugh,

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Frye,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	George,	Lapham,	Sewell,
Camden,	Gibson,	Logan,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	McPherson,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Williams.
Fair,	Jackson,	Pike,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I hope that we shall close up the bill. There are no other amendments to be offered, I think.

Mr. VOORHEES. I assure the chairman that I have none other.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the question on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be taken together.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. DOLPH. I now renew my amendment which was voted down as in Committee of the Whole. After line 1726 I move to insert:

To rebuild at Vancouver, the headquarters of the Military Department of the Columbia, barracks and quarters, old and rotten, and that have been inspected and condemned, in order to accommodate a garrison of one regiment of infantry and a battery of light artillery, $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Blair,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Lapham,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	McMillan,	Palmer,	Wilson.
Conger,	Mahone,	Pendleton,
Dolph,	Manderson,	Plumb,
Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Colquitt,	Groome,	Pugh,

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Anthony,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Sherman,
Butler,	Hale,	Lamar,	Slater,
Camden,	Hampton,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill,	McPherson,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Miller of N. Y.,	Williams.
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Pike,
Fair,	Jackson,	Sabin,
Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 837) granting a pension to Reuben J. Chewning;

A bill (H. R. 2312) granting a pension to Almira B. Kaler;

A bill (H. R. 6168) granting an increase of pension to Capt. H. D. F. Young; and

A bill (H. R. 1965) granting a pension to John A. Crozier.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 4767) granting a pension to Mary A. Henry;

A bill (S. 1446) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lou Gobright McFalls; and

A bill (H. R. 943) granting a pension to Samuel Barnard.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2221) granting a pension to Mary A. Henry, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4700) granting a pension to Simon E. Lewis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4089) to empower the commissioners of the District of Columbia to examine the claim of and providing for the payment of Outerbridge Horsey, assignee, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2184) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the Niagara River, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2360) for the relief of Agnes and Maria de Leon, heirs at law of Rebecca L. de Leon, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 97) for the relief of Theophilus Fisk Mills; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the joint resolution lie over until to-morrow, subject to call.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Committee on Public Printing is hereby instructed to examine into the numbers printed of the various documents, reports, bills, and other papers published by order of Congress, or of either House thereof, and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to report a bill, in December next, making such reductions in the numbers and cost of printing, and such changes and reductions in the distribution of said publications as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and that the said committee is also instructed to investigate the printing and binding for the Executive Departments, executed at the Government Printing Office and at the branch printing offices and binderies in the various Departments, and report a bill, in December next, making such reductions in expense and imposing such checks as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and said committee is further instructed to make any other investigations calculated in their opinion to reduce the cost of the public printing, and report the result thereof; and the said committee is hereby authorized to summon and to examine experts and witnesses, and to call upon the heads of Executive Departments and the Public Printer for such information regarding the preceding matters as they may desire; and any expenses necessarily incurred in making the investigations aforesaid shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress.

2. Said joint committee is hereby authorized to sit during the recess for the purposes of the first section hereof and in the discharge of its usual duties.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that in the morning the Pension Committee will expect to call up the pension cases on the Calendar immediately after the transaction of the necessary routine morning business.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 2, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk; and, unless objection be made, I shall ask its immediate consideration. It is a resolution proposing a new rule of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order each day, during the hour next after the morning hour, to ask unanimous consent for the consideration or passage of any measure; and for that purpose the Speaker shall call the names of the Members of the House and Delegates from the Territories in the alphabetical order in which they appear upon the roll of the House, commencing, however, on alternate days at the head and at the foot of the roll, going downward from the head and upward from the foot; but no member shall move the consideration of more than one measure when his name is called.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to move an amendment to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The rules require that one day's notice shall be given of any proposed change in the rules.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to inquire whether the one day's notice has been given?

The SPEAKER. It has not been; but it can be dispensed with by consent of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this resolution offered subject to objection?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution itself is in order, as I understand?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the resolution so as to commence the call of members every third day at the middle of the roll.

Mr. WELLER. I think I must object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. DUNN. I ask to make one single statement. I give notice to the House that unless this or some such just rule be adopted no measure shall ever pass this House by unanimous consent so long as I am a member of Congress.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Well, the gentleman's threat does not affect me in the slightest degree.

Mr. DUNN. I make no threat; I think such a proceeding is necessary, and I intend to enforce its adoption. I am not brought to this resolution by reason of personal pique or disappointment, but by long and careful observation and study of the unjust operation of the existing custom of the House. There is no rule of the House regulating the order of recognition of members for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to consider and pass unobjectionable legislation. There is always a large mass of such business that ought to be disposed of in this way. It is now entirely within the discretion of the Speaker to recognize whom he will and to refuse recognition to whom he will. For the purposes of this class of business many Congressional constituencies can be, and generally are, practically deprived of representation, not by the intentional fault of the Speaker, but in spite of his best efforts to be just to all alike.

In taking this step, in which I shall be very firm, I am influenced as much by a desire to relieve and protect the Speaker from what all know to be his greatest source of annoyance and embarrassment, as by a desire to secure equal and exact justice to all members of the House. I especially disclaim any feeling of disappointment on my own part, by reason of the action of our present Speaker. I cheerfully add my own testimony to that of others, that no fairer, more impartial, or just man ever occupied that chair than he. And if he can not mete out equal justice to all, we can all agree that we find in that fact the highest possible proof of the injustice of the existing custom and the best reason for the adoption of some just rule. I agree with General Grant, that "there is no better way to secure the repeal of a bad law than to rigidly enforce it." I shall simply enforce the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas what is the object of beginning at each end of the roll alternately but never beginning in the middle. The arrangement proposed simply means that the middle shall always be at the end.

Mr. REED. Let us draw lots.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If the resolution can not be amended I object to its consideration.

Mr. DUNN. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so referred.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will my amendment be considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. It can not be pending to a proposition not before the House. The gentleman objects to the proposition.

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order of business, and will yield only to measures to advance investigations ordered by the House and to reports of committees, but to nothing else. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is better order on the floor of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas also to except matters affecting the proper control of this Hall during the vacation of Congress.

Mr. DUNN. Certainly I will make that exception.

CARE OF HOUSE CLOAK-ROOMS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution retaining the two colored men, one on this and one on the other side, during the recess.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to retain upon the laborers' roll during the recess of Congress the names of Alex. B. Thomas and Wilson Grice, now in charge of the cloak-rooms of the House, and pay said parties out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $60 per month.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CATHARINE H. GLICK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, deceased, the bill having passed the Senate June 27, 1884.

There was no objection, and the request of the Senate was complied with.

PUBLIC LANDS INVESTIGATION.

Mr. COBB. I ask to submit a report from the Committee on the Public Lands, which I believe to be privileged.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution of the House providing for the raising of a committee to visit the State of Colorado and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and determine what legislation, if any, is necessary in order to settle and quiet titles to the conflicting claims to certain lands situate therein, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the same to the House with the following amendments, to wit:

In line 7, after the word "of," strike out the word "five" and insert instead thereof the word "three."

Also, in line 13, after the word "clerk," insert the words "which shall be," and after the word "stenographic," in same line, strike out the words "and a messenger."

Also, in line 17, after the word "exceeding," strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

And when said amendments are adopted your committee recommend the passage of said resolution.

Your committee believe that important legislation is required in order to settle conflicting claims to certain lands in said State and Territories, and we believe, in order to enable Congress to do so advisedly, it is necessary for a committee of the House to visit the sections where the lands in controversy are situate and ascertain the facts and report them to the House.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas under and in pursuance of the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, with the Republic of Mexico, concluded February 2, 1848, it was stipulated and provided that the residents of the ceded territory should be secured and protected in the enjoyment of their rights to the property which they held as citizens of the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas under and by virtue of the eighth section of an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyor-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes," approved July 22, 1854, which section makes it the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, and to make a report on all such claims, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of the same, which report shall be laid before Congress with a view to confirm bona fide grants; and from this, together with the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior issued in pursuance of said eighth section, under date of August 21, 1854, to the surveyor-general of New Mexico, a method of settling and adjudicating said private land claims was adopted and prescribed; and

Whereas, in pursuance of said law of Congress and instructions referred to, the surveyor-general of New Mexico has examined one hundred and fifty of said grants or private land claims, and reported the same to Congress for confirmation, of which number sixty-six have been confirmed by act of Congress, and in many cases patents have been issued to the original grantees, their heirs or legal representatives, leaving eighty-four that have been reported for confirmation and upon which no action has been taken by Congress; and

Whereas the owners of said private land claims have been put to great expense in complying with the act of Congress and the instructions to the surveyor-general as aforesaid, and their titles still remain unadjudicated by no act of negligence on their part; and

Whereas the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and the State of Colorado are fast settling up, and it is of the highest importance both to the Government and the owners of said grants that the same shall be speedily adjudicated and settled; and

Whereas it is alleged and charged that some of the private land claims or grants in said Territories and States are invalid and fraudulent, and that the surveys thereof have not been in conformity with the original grants: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That in order to ascertain all the facts in relation to Spanish and Mexican grants, and other private land claims, in the State of Colorado and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and to determine what legislation, if any, is necessary in order to settle all conflicting claims and to quiet titles, a special committee, consisting of five members of the House, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to visit said State and Territories, for the purpose of thoroughly investigating the titles, surveys, and present condition of such grants and other private land claims. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a clerk, a stenographer, and a messenger, and may sit during the recess of Congress. The evidence taken before said committee and their report thereon shall be submitted to the House at its next December session; and that a sum not exceeding $10,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, to defray the expenses incurred by said committee, to be paid on the order of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MILLS. Is that a priviledged report?

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair is endeavoring to ascertain. So far the Chair does not discover anything in the resolution referred to the committee to make it privileged.

Mr. COBB. I think it comes under the resolution offered by my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN]. I am not sure of it, and I trust there will be no objection to it, and for this reason: there is a great deal of fraud and villainy going on in the States and Territories referred to in reference to the public lands, and the matter should be inquired into.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is not showing the resolution is privileged but arguing the merits.

Mr. COBB. It is known to many members of Congress that in the sections indicated enormous frauds are being perpetrated in reference to the public lands, and it is believed necessary a committee should go there and investigate the facts and make report to Congress. The committee reduce the expenses from $10,000 to $5,000.

Mr. REED. I object, and demand the regular order.

FORFEITURE OF A LAND GRANT.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. 7495) to declare forfeited certain lands granted in aid of the construction of a railroad from Portland, in Oregon, to the Central Pacific Railroad, in California; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged resolution with reference to the ventilation of the Hall. I am directed by the committee to report a resolution favoring a proposition submitted by the Exhaust Ventilation Company of Chicago, and ask that the accompanying resolution be read and the report printed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to accept the proposition by them reported and attached to their report, and to at once proceed with the introduction and trial of the new system in accordance with the terms of said proposition.

The resolution, report, and proposition were ordered to be printed and laid over for future action.

Mr. HARDY, on behalf of the minority of the committee, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

ADDITIONAL LABORERS DOORKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution—"Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ four additional laborers during the recess, namely, from the adjournment of this session to the 1st of December, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $720 per annum while employed"— report that they have carefully considered the same, and ask its adoption.

Mr. HOLMAN. That, I believe, is subject to the point of order?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts relating to the expenditure of a portion of the contingent fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it involves an appropriation of money.

The SPEAKER. Only the disposition of money appropriated by a general appropriation bill for the contingent expenses of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. But at all events it involves the appropriation of money or the expenditure of money.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I think the rules of the House provide for the control of this fund under the direction of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. But I waive the point of order and simply desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the House has just adopted a resolution providing for the employment of two additional laborers under the Doorkeeper.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. And I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana that four more are necessary, as the gentleman will perceive if he will be patient and listen for a few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman mean four in addition to the two already employed, making six in all?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I will state to the gentleman the condition of the force of laborers now employed. We have ten session laborers, eight cloak-room laborers, and ten annual laborers. The session and cloak-room laborers go off when the session ends, which leaves ten laborers. Out of this ten one is the Speaker's messenger, one is in members' closet, and, owing to the need of help in the document-room, two are assigned there. This building has to be swept, washed, and cleaned from top to bottom every day. The committee-rooms, carpets, and furniture, and the Hall of the House have to be cleaned during recess. Owing to shortness of recess these four additional laborers are needed by the janitor to do this work. It is the duty of the eight cloak-room laborers to keep the Hall of the House clean. These eight go off when we adjourn, and the janitor's force must do all the work.

The Architect says that the present janitor under our Doorkeeper has kept the House side of this building cleaner than it has ever been kept. The Senate has twelve annual laborers during the recess to keep that side in order, and they have fewer committee-rooms and less work to do than the eight laborers on the House side. During the long recess the men have several more months to get everything in order, and the present force is ample then; but in this short time between this session and the next, for the welfare of the building, the carpets, and furniture, this additional force is really necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we have just employed two additional laborers.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. But as I have said the building must be cleaned up during the short recess every day, and the committee-rooms and the carpets must be carefully attended to; and in fact the whole house has to be cleaned up during the short recess. The officers in charge of the House inform the committee that it will be impossible to get along without this force and perform the duties imposed upon them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman again whether he took into account the fact that a few moments ago the House provided for the employment of two additional laborers.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I took that into account, but this force will be required in addition to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has that been considered by the committee? Has the committee considered that increase in recommending this additional force of laborers? And I ask also if my friend does not know that the custom has been in this respect to employ only the two already provided for?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. My friend from Indiana knows that this recess will be a short one, and it is impossible for the present force to do the work. That is the information the committee have from what they believe to be reliable authority.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this been done heretofore?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. It has been the custom, and in view of the necessities of the Doorkeeper's department, and upon that ground alone, the committee have now recommended the employment of these additional laborers, to be employed from the adjournment of this session until next December.

I move the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether we are to understand that this is an addition of six to the present force?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. No; an addition of four only.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But two have been employed this morning, and this proposes four more. I do not see the necessity of six additional laborers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution reported by the committee.

The question was taken; the House divided, and there were—ayes 63, noes 44.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. ERMENTROUT were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 53.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not consume the time of the House, since a considerable majority of the House insists upon increasing this force.

So (no further count being demanded) the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union made to the House yesterday afternoon, on which a vote was ordered to be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal to-day. The question is upon the adoption of the substitute reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is the reading of the substitute demanded?

Mr. RANDALL. It is not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I think consent was given that there should be a vote by yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That was only in committee. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask what bill it is a substitute for.

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the substitute reported by the Committee of the Whole for the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 91, not voting 82; as follows:

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. KETCHAM, on the fortification and naval appropriation bills.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. BARR, on this vote.

Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. BINGHAM, on the fortification bill. Mr. HOPKINS would vote for the substitute and Mr. BINGHAM against it.

Mr. HURD with Mr. ATKINSON, for this day.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. GRAVES, on this vote.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, with Mr. DORSHEIMER, on this vote.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. HOUK, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? On this question the rules require the yeas and nays be taken.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 193, nays 46, not voting 85; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. HOUK with Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, on all political questions for to-day.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 4651) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate requested the House to return the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

FISH COMMISSIONER'S REPORT.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1884 be printed, and that there be printed 11,000 extra copies, of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House, 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, and 500 for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereto thereon added, the illustrations to be obtained by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRANCH HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the Senate requesting the return by the House of the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers in either the State of Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the request of the Senate be granted; it is usual to do so.

Mr. KASSON. Is any reason given for the request?

The SPEAKER. No reason is given in the message; it is not usual to give a reason.

The request of the Senate was granted.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 475, granting arrears of pension to Emily Agnel, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table at this time the Senate amendments to the bill known as the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. WILLIS. I am directed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to ask that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in, and that the bill with the Senate amendments numbered be printed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it necessary to reserve points of order at this stage?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] reserves all points of order.

Mr. WILLIS. The request I made has been by the unanimous direction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

There being no objection, the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, were taken from the Speaker's table and non-concurred in, and the bill, with the Senate amendments numbered, was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. COBB. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope that will not be done.

The question was taken on the motion to dispense with the morning hour, and it was not agreed to (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof).

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. That motion can not be entertained until the morning hour has been dispensed with or occupied.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I beg the Speaker's pardon. This motion takes precedence of the morning hour, as the Chair will find upon examination of the order on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The Chair was thinking of the resolution adopted on motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in regard to business from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can displace the Committee on Public Lands. I desire that we may go to the House Calendar for the purpose of——

The SPEAKER. No motion has been made on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. I tried to get the floor for that purpose, but could not. I move to go to the House Calendar for the purpose of taking up the bill forfeiting the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order until after the morning hour has been dispensed with or occupied. The gentleman's object can be reached by defeating the motion of his colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER]. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to antagonize that with a motion——

The SPEAKER. This question is not debatable. The way to antagonize the proposition is to vote against it.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. STOCKSLAGER, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 65, noes 98.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks on the subject of public buildings.

Mr. MORSE. If we can get rid of this matter so cheaply as that, I think we had better grant the privilege.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, leave to print will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, the resolution proposing the appointment of a committee to make investigation relating to affairs of the Alaska Commercial Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WEHRLE, WERK & SON.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, also reported a bill (H. R. 7496) for the relief of Wehrle, Werk & Son; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CIRCUIT COURT, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. McCOID, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7324) providing for holding a term of the circuit court in Minneapolis, Minn.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

UNORGANIZED TERRITORY SOUTH OF KANSAS.

Mr. McCOID, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 489) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7488) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HILLSBOROUGH NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, also reported back favorably the bill (H. Mr. CANNON. I object.

PURCHASERS OF LAND IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. PAYSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1737) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELOCATION OF SITES OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments joint resolution (H. Res. 281) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend action in the matter of erecting public buildings in all cases where bills have been reported favorably to this House authorizing the relocation of sites for such buildings; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the petition of John A. Nowell, J. C. Warren, and other citizens of Boston, with an accompanying resolution, and ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the same.

Mr. CANNON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TALBOTT. This is a resolution for an investigation of an officer connected with the navy-yard near Boston, and it ought to be passed. I ask that it may be read for the information of the House, and then if the gentleman chooses to demand the regular order, of course I am perfectly willing to abide by it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has already demanded the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was in hopes that the gentleman would withhold it for a little while to permit this report to be made.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and considering revenue bills.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to give notice that I shall antagonize that motion, my object being to proceed with the regular order for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The only way to antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Virginia is to vote it down.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the regular order is the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. What unfinished business?

Mr. CANNON. If there is no unfinished business, then it is in order, as I understand the rule, to entertain a motion that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills raising revenue, or a motion would also have been in order to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The gentleman from Virginia makes the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the former purpose.

Mr. CANNON. On page 203 of the Digest, as I understand it, the regular order of business after the unfinished business has been disposed of is the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

I find this language:

Unfinished business having been disposed of, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will now read clause 9 of Rule XVI he will see that at any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. The only way then to get to the Speaker's table is to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Virginia?

The SPEAKER. That is the only way.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Would it be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole to take up the educational bill?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The bill of the gentleman from Virginia would have to be antagonized in Committee of the Whole if the House went into committee at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Can we not antagonize and vote down his motion——

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. THOMPSON. In this way: when we go into committee, if this House shall so decide, by refusing to take up that particular bill and then proceed with the consideration of the educational bill?

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole, of course, can take up the educational bill, provided it is the desire of the committee to do so; but it would first have to refuse to consider the bills referred to by the gentleman from Virginia and all other bills upon the Calendar preceding the bill to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. HENLEY. Would it be parliamentary for me to state to the House that I desire to antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Virginia by a land-grant bill?

The SPEAKER. That is debate. The question is not debatable. The gentleman will, of course, antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Virginia by voting against it.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue.

The question was taken, and the House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 68.

Mr. TUCKER, Mr. McMILLIN, and others demanded the yeas and yeas.

The yeas and nays were ordered—40 members voting in favor thereof.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has twice stated the question, but will do so again if there be no objection. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask what bill?

The SPEAKER. Bills raising revenue, such bills as are on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole, in their regular order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask when it would be in order to go to the Speaker's table to take up the Mexican pension bill?

The SPEAKER. If the House does not go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the motion to go to the Speaker's table would be in order unless interfered with by some other motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I give notice that we will endeavor to take up the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEIFER. Notwithstanding that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending motion to go into Committee of the Whole would it not now be in order for a conference report to be presented?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] desires to present a conference report.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I present the report of a committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 35 to the bill of the House No. 6861, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the said amendment numbered 35.

WM. H. FORNEY,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. B. PLUMB,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask that the statement be read.

The statement was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35 to the bill H. R. 6861, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year 1885, submit the following written statement in explanation of the conference report:

The effect of the action recommended on the amendment numbered 35 strikes from the bill as it passed the House the following:

"That for the better accomplishment of the object of the acts authorizing the construction of the railroads hereinafter referred to, and the better to secure to the Government the use and benefit of the same, all acts authorizing the building and construction of those railroads which have received, in addition to land grants, Government aid by loan or guarantee of bonds by the United States, and all other acts, parts of acts, and provisions having relation thereto, are hereby so altered, amended, and modified that hereafter the compensation paid or allowed for the carrying and transportation of the property or troops of the United States by such railroad companies or their assigns or successors shall not exceed 50 per cent. of the amount paid by private parties for the same kind of service; but nothing herein shall be construed to waive the right of the United States to further amend said acts, or any or either of them, hereafter, as in the judgment of Congress justice or public policy may require, or waive any right now existing in favor of the United States."

WM. H. FORNEY,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Having been appointed by the Chair as one of the conference committee on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill, I desire to say that I have declined to sign the report of the committee of conference for this reason: When the conference committee made their report on the Post-Office appropriation bill I joined with the majority of the conferees on the part of the House in that report, which insisted on the provision adopted by the House that there should be a reduction of the compensation to railroads for the carrying of mails. The same reasons I urged there apply to the provision in the Army appropriation bill with reference to the transportation of military stores and troops.

I believed then and believe now, Mr. Speaker, that we are paying the railroad companies far more than is just and reasonable. I have not changed my convictions upon that question. When the Post-Office appropriation bill was first brought before this House and this question was acted upon by a yea-and-nay vote the House sustained the conclusion reached by the Committee on Appropriations. Subsequently, when the first committee of conference had failed to agree on that provision of the bill, the House, likewise by a yea-and-nay vote, declared the Committee on Appropriations was right in demanding a reduction of the rate of compensation to railroads. But on yesterday it appeared that some gentlemen had changed their views on the subject, and a majority declared that the House should abandon this position, and not struggle any further with the Senate on that question. My colleagues on the conference committee on the Army appropriation bill have regarded that vote as an indication of the will of the House on that question, and have consented that the House shall recede from its disagreement to the amendment. So far as I am individually concerned I will say the action of the majority of the House on yesterday does not meet with my convictions of duty, and therefore I have declined to sign the conference report.

Mr. FORNEY. I will state that the reason I have signed the conference report is based on the fact that the House on yesterday decided it should recede from the similar provision in the Post-Office appropriation bill. I have therefore signed the report, believing that that vote amounted to an instruction from the House to do so.

Mr. KEIFER. As one of the conferees on the part of the House on this bill I desire to say a word or two. It may be very doubtful policy on the part of the Government to cripple these railroad corporations that are indebted to the Government and to insist at the same time that everything should be done on the part of the railroad companies. It is very doubtful whether the Government can require them to carry the army freights and do transportation work for the Government at much less rates than they can afford to do for private individuals. That is doubtful from several points of view.

But I do not rise for the purpose of discussing that question. I leave the vote of yesterday to answer all that has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. We are probably in the last hours of the session, at least we all hope we are to get away from here in a very short time, and I think it important we should hasten along. I believe there are other matters much more important to the country than this question of the rates of compensation to be paid for Government transportation. I think it important we should hasten through this matter of disagreement for the purpose of taking up a few bills that are of great general interest.

I refer especially to the bill known as the McPherson bill, to amend the national banking act. That bill promises substantial relief from an impending financial crisis now threatened all over the country on account of the scarcity of currency within the reach of the public. I refer, also, to the Mexican pension bill, which grants relief to a great many worthy persons, and in addition contains many important and desirable changes in our general pension laws not likely to be enacted into laws through separate bills. I might mention other things also. I hope, and now express earnestly the hope, that this Congress may adjourn soon, but not without having these measures brought up and passed. And I appeal to the House, and especially to the committees having these matters in charge, to see to it that they are brought up and passed before we adjourn.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the motion which is now before the House to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills should prevail, would it not be in order for the House to lay aside the first bill that might be reached on the Calendar and take up the bill to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Mexico?

The SPEAKER. That is scarcely a parliamentary question for the Chair to answer. The rule provides that when objection is made to the consideration of any bill in Committee of the Whole the committee shall rise and the House shall vote whether that bill shall be passed over or considered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 133, not voting 111; as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. BRAINERD with Mr. DIBBLE, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. ROWELL, on this vote.

Mr. CLAY with Mr. STRUBLE, for this day.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. SINGLETON, on this vote. If present, Mr. GREEN would vote "ay" and Mr. SINGLETON "no."

Mr. STEVENS with Mr. BELFORD, for this day.

Mr. LIBBEY with Mr. CABELL, for this day.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. BARR, for this day.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for this day.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York, with Mr. BEACH, for to-day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, is absent on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above stated.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask consent that an order be made that the House request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to make what I regard as a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will waive my motion for the present, if I can be recognized to make it afterward.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] requests unanimous consent to submit for present consideration a resolution, which will be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. Read subject to objection?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas numerous fraudulent transactions have recently been disclosed in several of the Executive Departments of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of thirteen members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to inquire into any errors, abuses, or frauds in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting the public service, with a view to ascertain what changes and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; and the said committee is hereby instructed to examine into the accounts and expenses of the several Executive Departments of the Government, whether any fraudulent transactions have occurred therein; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by genuine vouchers sufficient to establish the justness of the same; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with law; whether any and what provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amounts; whether any retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments of the Government without detriment to the public service; whether there is or has been any neglect to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others——

Mr. HISCOCK (interrupting the reading). I object and call for the regular order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I do not object, but I think the law is good enough now; all that is necessary is to turn the rascals out and put honest men in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to go to business on the Speaker's table, for the purpose of reaching the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The reading of the paper was commenced by unanimous consent, and no one has a right to object until the reading is completed.

The SPEAKER. Still the Chair supposes that the gentleman had heard enough to show that he objected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I move to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the point of order that this resolution seems to be a reflection on the committees of this House, and I think it ought to be read through. This is a Democratic House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not permit it to be read through when the regular order is demanded.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It is a reflection on the committees of the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to go to business on the Speaker's table to take up the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] take the responsibility of refusing to allow investigation to be made?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do. The resolution is too much of a reflection upon the committees of this House. It implies that they have neglected their duties.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It is a reflection on a Republican administration, which needs investigation. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HISCOCK. Your standing committees have had jurisdiction to investigate the administration during the entire session. I do not propose to create roving committees for electioneering purposes.

Mr. REED. I wish to protest against the remark that this resolution implies any "reflection." The gentleman always makes his charges without reflection. [Cries of "Regular order!" and confusion.]

Mr. WELLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Chair will suspend business until order has been restored.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to go to the Speaker's table to take up the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I thought I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. It is always the practice of the Chair to recognize a gentleman who has been in charge of a bill when he rises to make a motion in connection with the bill. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who reported this bill to the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I was afraid the gentleman from Illinois would forget about it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman need not have any such apprehension. It is very strange that at this late day he has become converted to this measure.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable. The gentleman from Illinois moves to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Several members called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. Is this a motion to go generally to business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. That is the only motion that can be made—to take up business upon the Speaker's table in its regular order.

The question was taken on the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table; and there were—yeas 153, nays 73, not voting 98; as follows:

So the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES (after the roll-call was concluded). Mr. Speaker, I was necessarily absent on a conference committee while this vote was being taken. I would like to record my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair under the rules can not entertain the request.

Mr. GEDDES. I was not advised that the roll-call was proceeding, or I would have been present. If present, I would have voted "ay."

Mr. ROWELL. During the roll-call just concluded I was out of the House upon a conference committee. I would like to record my vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain that request under the rule.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, with Mr. STORM, on this vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Do I understand that the first bill in order——

The SPEAKER. The business upon the Speaker's table will be taken up in regular order under the rule of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4651) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes."

SOUTHERN KANSAS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following privileged report:

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 4680) granting right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, and 13, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 8, and 9, and consent that the same may be stricken out.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with the following amendment: Amend the said Senate amendment by adding after the word "Interior" the words "and in accordance with said intercourse laws;" and the Senate agree to the same.

OLIN WELLBORN,
RICE A. PIERCE,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. J. INGALLS,
H. L. DAWES,
RICHARD COKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement accompanying the report under the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered respectively 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, and 13.

The Senate recedes from its amendments numbered respectively 5, 8, and 9.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agrees to the same with the following amendment, namely: Amend the said Senate amendment by adding after the word "Interior" the words "in accordance with said intercourse laws." This amendment to the Senate amendment simply makes specific what the Senate amendment was doubtless designed to effect by providing that all officers, servants, and employés of the railroad shall be permitted to reside on the right of way, but subject to the limitations and regulations of the Indian intercourse laws, and such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior thereunder.

The thirteenth amendment of the Senate from which the House is asked to recede from its disagreement provides that the railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway, wherever said roads and highways do now or hereafter may cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

The Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 10, and 11 are substantially the same as those incorporated in the House bill 3961, granting the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company, and heretofore accepted by the House.

Senate amendment numbered 5, from which the Senate now recedes, gave to the general council of either of the nations or to the tribes through whose lands said railway may be located twelve months after the filing of maps of definite location to dissent from the allowances provided for, instead of four months, as expressed in the bill.

Senate amendment 8, from which the Senate now recedes, struck out the provision in section 6 which provided that claims for damages for a settlement upon the right of way subsequent to the filing of maps by the company showing the same should not be valid as against said company.

Senate amendment 9, from which the Senate now recedes, made it obligatory upon the company to complete its entire road through the Indian Territory within two years from the filing of its map showing its located line.

OLIN WELLBORN,
RICE A. PIERCE,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. I move the adoption of the report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. PERKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the river and harbor appropriation bill Mr. WILLIS, Mr. BLANCHARD, and Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The House has decided to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, and I desire to raise the question of consideration against the other business on the Speaker's table. Under the special order adopted on the 8th of April it is provided that the House shall consider such bills for the erection of public buildings as are reported from the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and also such Senate bills as are on the Speaker's table. I now call up those bills under that order.

I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry as to how I can get at the execution of that special order; whether I shall have to raise the question of consideration against each bill as it comes up.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the bills on the Speaker's table will be taken up in their regular order, precedence, of course, being given to House bills with Senate amendments.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. But does not the special order take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to proceed with the consideration of those bills under the special order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The House has already decided not to proceed to the consideration of the special order.

The SPEAKER. The House decided not to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering those bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The House having determined to go to the table, does not that take precedence?

The SPEAKER. That is the business in order, unless the House by another vote shall determine to proceed to the consideration of the special order referred to. The Chair will cause the special order to be read, so that members may see its effect.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendars and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made; and that in the consideration of each bill and its amendments not more than thirty minutes shall be consumed in debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana under that order of the House moves that the House take up for consideration bills on the Speaker's table relating to the construction of public buildings. Of course it requires a vote.

Mr. KEIFER. Would they not come up when we are in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The bills are on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CALKINS. It would have been in order to make that point before going to the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table may be interrupted by any privileged matter, as was done a few moments ago by the report of a committee of conference. The gentleman from Indiana under the special order moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bills for the erection of public buildings.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us vote it down.

The SPEAKER. The House can vote it down, of course.

The question recurred on Mr. STOCKSLAGER's motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 82.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 132, not voting 120; as follows:

Mr. SCALES with Mr. BARR, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. ELLWOOD, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had directed the return to the House of Representatives of the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion, and asked a conference with the House on said bill, and had appointed Messrs. COCKRELL, HARRISON, and SEWELL managers at said conference on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had directed the return of the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, or Nebraska, and asked a conference with the House of Representatives on said bill, and had appointed Mr. HARRISON, Mr. MILLER of California, and Mr. COCKRELL as the managers at said conference on the part of the Senate.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES, DAKOTA.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Senate propose the following amendments:

In section 8, line 3, after the word "determine," to strike out "any matter or cause in which the United States is a party, and all causes or matters in admiralty," and insert in lieu thereof:

"All matters and causes that the court of any district in said Territory now possesses."

The next amendment is to add, as a new section, to be numbered 14:

"SEC. 14. That all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect (except as to the number of judges) as if this act had not been passed."

Also, after section 8, add the following sections:

"SEC. 9. That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Washington shall consist of a chief-justice and three associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum, but no justice shall act as a member of the supreme court in any action or proceeding brought to such court by writ of error, bill of exceptions, or appeal from a decision, judgment, or decree rendered by him as judge of a district court.

"SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the President to appoint one additional associate justice of said supreme court in manner now provided by law, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified.

"SEC. 11. That the said Territory shall be divided into four judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each district by one of the justices of the supreme court thereof at such time and place as may be prescribed by law. Each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned.

"SEC. 12. That until changed by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, the first district of said Territory shall consist of the counties of Walla Walla, Columbia, Garfield, Assotin, Franklin, Adams, Whitman, and Spokane; the second, of the counties of Pierce, Thurston, Mason, Chehalis, Lewis, Pacific, Wahkiakum, Cowlitz, and Clarke; the third, of the counties of King, Kitsap, Jefferson, Clallam, Island, San Juan, Whatcom, Skagit, and Snohomish; and the fourth, of the counties of Skamania, Klikitat, Yakima, Kittitass, Douglas, Lincoln, and Stevens.

"SEC. 13. That temporarily, and until otherwise ordered by law, the additional associate justice to be appointed under this act is hereby assigned to said fourth district thereof, and the time and place as now fixed by the statutes of said Territory for holding court therein shall remain until changed by law."

Also amend the title so as to read: "A bill providing for two associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move the reference of that bill, with the Senate amendments, to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move that the Senate amendments be concurred in. I understand that this bill has been thoroughly considered in the Senate committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion to refer to the committee.

Mr. BROADHEAD. One word in regard to that bill. It came originally from the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, and in the judgment of that committee it is absolutely necessary that this additional judicial force should be granted for this Territory.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this leads to no debate I will withdraw my motion and let the Senate amendments be considered. But if there is likely to be debate upon it I must insist upon the motion to refer.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to make a privileged motion.

I desire to call up the special order of February 21, and I wish to say to the members of the House that it relates to a bill providing pensions for the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war; and if gentlemen desire to take a step in the interest of Mexican pensioners, now is the time to effect that purpose by the immediate consideration and passage of that bill.

Mr. REED and others demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that this is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The committee have determined to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, and I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that that order of the House is of no higher character than any other order; and when any gentleman calls up a matter of special privilege the House must consider it; otherwise the House would be placed in a position where it might never leave the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has not the privilege expired with reference to the consideration of that bill. It was in February last I understand that the order was made.

The SPEAKER. But it was a continuing order from day to day until considered or otherwise disposed of. The House of course has it in its power to vote down the demand for the special order.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the Clerk had better read that special order, so that we can understand just exactly what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the order to be read for the information of the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If gentlemen will allow me a moment's explanation——

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to know whether, if we proceed to the consideration of the order which the gentleman from Alabama calls up, it will then be in order upon a motion to substitute the Senate bill in place of it?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then it becomes merely an amendment to the House bill, and is not the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. It will in that case be merely a House amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us have the special order read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed it to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That bill (H. R. 3962) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and other wars therein named, and for other purposes, be made the special order in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, on Thursday, the 21st day of February, 1884, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills or reports from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STEELE. That bill has already been taken up and passed under a suspension of the rules, has it not?

The SPEAKER. No; a different bill was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to make an inquiry. Is the bill referred to in this special order the bill that provides pensions for the soldiers of the Indian wars and other disturbances?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed as to the contents of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will inform the gentleman from Indiana that it seeks to pension the Mexican soldiers. And now is an opportunity to do so if the gentleman and his friends really desire to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is not an answer to my question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it to be a question of consideration merely.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to proceed with the consideration of the special order.

The question was taken.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, nays 126, not voting 114; as follows:

So the House refused to proceed to the consideration of the special order, the bill H. R. 3962.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

There was no objection.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. MURPHY, on this vote.

Mr. SCALES with Mr. COOK, on all questions, for to-day.

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. PATTON, on this vote.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE with Mr. MILLIKEN, on this vote.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. BINGHAM, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. FINERTY with Mr. BAYNE, on this vote. Mr. BAYNE would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill on the Speaker's table.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican War, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to reserve all points of order on the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The point of order can not be made until the amendments are read.

The Clerk read the first amendment, as follows:

In lines 7 to 11 strike out the following:

"Who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847-'48 with Mexico, or who, being enlisted as aforesaid, actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war."

And in lieu thereof insert as follows:

"Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army and Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation."

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. Would it be in order to move to concur in each of these amendments as they are read?

The SPEAKER. It would. The gentleman can move to concur or non-concur in each of the Senate amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur in the amendment which has been read.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order that that amendment of the Senate under the rules should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama make the point of order against the amendment now read?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am not sure that the point of order lies against that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur, and ask for the previous question on that motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask for the rereading of the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This does not in any way change the status of the Mexican soldier.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Now I make the point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that this amendment should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman will state the grounds on which he bases his point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, you will notice that that amendment——

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman from Alabama, but I thought the Speaker had already ruled upon that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought on hearing the amendment read it was not subject to the point of order, and is still of that impression. But as the gentleman from Alabama has insisted upon the point of order the Chair desires to hear him.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. After the question shall have been disposed of as to the point of order now made by the gentleman from Alabama on this particular amendment, will it be too late to raise the point of order on the bill and amendments?

The SPEAKER. The disposition of this point of order does not deprive any gentleman of any right he otherwise has under the rules. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama on the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The bill as it passed the House granted pensions to soldiers and sailors who actually served in the war with Mexico for sixty days or were actually engaged in a battle. Now, you will notice this amendment of the Senate gives a pension to every soldier that actually served for fourteen days in Mexico or on the coasts or frontier of Mexico or en route thereto or was engaged in a battle. Now, sir, that shortens the number of days required for the service of a soldier and will necessarily increase the number of beneficiaries under the bill. The amendment also, Mr. Speaker, puts a new class on the bill. It puts on it sailors who were on the coasts of Mexico, while the bill as originally passed was confined to soldiers and sailors who had served for sixty days. On these grounds I think the amendment is subject to the point of order I have made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not desire to be heard on the point of order, and ask the Chair to rule on it.

The SPEAKER. It may be that the Senate amendment will increase the number of persons who will be entitled to pensions under this act should it become a law; or, on the other hand, it may be that the Senate amendment by reason of its limitations may diminish the number of those who will receive pensions under this bill if it shall become a law. There is nothing upon the face of the amendment which will enable the Chair to say whether it will increase or diminish the number of pensioners. Therefore the Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick;

An act (H. R. 2400) for the relief of Judith Lauter;

An act (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin;

An act (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella J. Ramsdell;

An act (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair;

An act (H. R. 7164) to amend chapter 20 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, concerning mechanics' liens;

An act (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880;

An act (H. R. 6542) granting a pension to Harriet S. Brisbine;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 283) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884.

PENSIONS FOR MEXICAN WAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

The question was upon the demand for the previous question upon concurring in the first amendment of the Senate.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think that we had better have the yeas and nays on concurring in this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes is allowed for debate, fifteen minutes to be controlled by those in favor of the motion to concur and fifteen minutes by those against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would inquire upon which side the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is recognized to speak?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am opposed to this amendment. I opposed this bill originally because I am opposed to the principle of service pensions; that is, I am not in favor of a life pension for mere enlistment or enrollment in the military service or for service regardless of length of the service or the character of the service, as this amendment of the Senate contemplates in regard to service or enlistment in the Mexican war.

I believe in the right of every soldier who has served in any war in which the United States has been engaged to receive a pension, if in that service he has suffered disability, whether from wounds received in battle or otherwise, the pension to be proportionate to the degree of disability which he has sustained. But pensions for service or as in this amendment for the mere enlistment of fourteen days, if en route to Mexico, I am opposed to. I am opposed to any such principle as gives the same pension for fourteen days as for service for one or two years, or service in campaigns and battles or for actual disability.

This Senate amendment makes no distinction between actual service in Mexico, service in battles, and an enlistment after the last battle was fought and the last shot was fired in that war. The records of the War Department show that nearly 40 per cent. of all the names borne upon the muster-rolls of the Mexican war are names of those who enlisted after the last battle in that war was fought. This bill gives the same rate of pension to these men that it gives to men who served all through the war and fought in every battle, if there were any who participated in all the battles.

Where is the equity of such a principle?

I say the principle is wrong; it makes no distinction as to the value, the character, or the length of the service; it grants the same pension for fourteen days as for a year, and the same for one year as for two or three years. The principle, I say, is unjust and vicious, and one which no other country in the world has ever recognized or acted upon. It is a principle which if adopted as a fixed one in this country will result in a pension-roll that in the end will bankrupt the Government.

It is a principle that encourages war. If by a few days or a few months' service at the end of a war a life pension can be claimed, then war becomes an object and not merely an end; and the motive for enlistment, instead of being patriotic devotion to country, becomes mere mercenary gain. I know we have a precedent in the war of 1812; and this I claim to be the only precedent, for I deny that the pensions granted by the acts of 1828 and 1832 to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war were intended as service pensions or were really service pensions. In the debates on that question it was stated over and over again that in granting pensions they were in reality only paying a debt that had never been paid. This was stated by Webster, Choate, Ellsworth, Burgess, and others, and it was declared repeatedly that the act pensioning Revolutionary soldiers could not be regarded as a precedent, and the authors of that act scouted the idea that the soldiers of the war of 1812 or any other war could claim pensions as a right, or for any such reasons as led to granting pensions to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war. And it was for this reason, that the soldiers of the Revolutionary war in the first place took all the chances of establishing a government; and secondly, they served without pay, or were paid in continental money, which at last fell to one cent on the dollar.

In the debates I refer to statements were made to show that if the Revolutionary soldiers were allowed a pension of $8 a month, they would not receive more than was at that time actually due them for their services during the Revolutionary war. In other words, pensions to Revolutionary soldiers were given them in lieu of pay which they had never received.

The act pensioning the soldiers of the war of 1812 was passed long after the war and went through almost without debate. I believe it to be a bad precedent, one that I am not willing to follow. I am not willing myself to vote pensions on any other theory than for disabilities arising out of actual service. Pensions for disabilities thus incurred I hold to be but just compensation for loss sustained in the service of a common country, but where there is no loss no compensation is due.

My theory of a pension is this: In the first place all good citizens, if their country calls them into service, are bound to take up arms and fight for its defense. Patriotism bids us all do that. If in the common service one man is wounded and another is not the wounded man has a claim for compensation which the other man does not have.

Laborers in the United States earn on the average about $300 a year. Now, that I believe ought to be taken as the standard for a total-disability pension; and any soldier who has incurred total disability by reason of wounds in battle or disease contracted in the service in line of duty ought, I think, to have a pension equal to the average earnings of a laboring man. In other words, a man who has been totally disabled in the military service in the common defense should have help equal to the labor of another man. This seems to me a sound principle and a just rule. If a man has incurred in service in the common defense, by wounds or otherwise, half-disability, he should receive half the average earnings of a laboring man, and so on downward, and no pensions ought to go higher unless the disability is so great or of such a kind as to require the constant care of another.

But if a man has suffered no disability, on what ground can he lay claim to the services of another man to support him? If in the service a man has incurred no disability either by wounds or disease, on what ground, I say, can he urge a claim for a pension—that is, for the service of another man in his support—when he is in no wise disabled from taking care of himself? He has had pay for his services. What other just claim can there be except compensation for some disability?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Did not the pension acts of 1818, 1828, 1832, and 1871 grant what the gentleman terms "service pensions?" The pensions given by those acts were not granted for disability incurred in the service.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman wishes to ask me a question I will answer it. I say that the acts of 1828 and 1832 granted pensions on the theory that the Revolutionary soldiers had never been paid. It was pay and not pension that was granted. The act of 1871——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can not yield further. The act of 1871 gave a service pension; but it was a bad precedent. Again, with reference to this amendment——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Just one moment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it is for a question I will yield.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman from Ohio is altogether mistaken——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Well, I can not yield for debate. If I had anticipated this discussion I should have had the documents here before me; but I object to further interruption.

This amendment of the Senate provides that a soldier who was enrolled for fourteen days, and was en route for Mexico, that is, if he had started for Mexico, and has become from any cause disabled, no matter in what way, a private broil, for that matter, or who has reached the age of 62 years, becomes entitled to a pension. But the amendment makes no such provision for Union soldiers who have reached the age of 62. It gives a pension to the soldier of the Mexican war if he has served fourteen days and become disabled from any cause or reached the age of 62 years.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to occupy the floor without interruption.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I say this amendment proposes to grant a pension to a man who enlisted in the service during the war with Mexico and served only fourteen days, if he was only en route for Mexico and is from any cause disabled or is 62 years of age. But the amendment makes no such provision for the Union soldier.

A Union soldier may have served three years or during the whole war, and may have participated in a dozen battles, and may now be 62 years of age; but he gets no pension under this provision. It discriminates, therefore, against soldiers of the late war and in favor of soldiers of the Mexican war. Why this discrimination against the Union soldier? I believe that soldiers of all the wars should stand upon an absolute equality as to the right to a pension. A man who enlisted in the Mexican war when 22 years of age is now, if living, about 60. A man who enlisted in the late war at the age of 36—and there were thousands such—is now, if living, 60 years of age also. I ask upon what principle shall one man who is now 60 and who served but fourteen days receive a pension, while another who served three or four years and went through a dozen battles and is 60 years of age is denied a pension? If the principle is right, let it be applied equally to the soldiers of both wars. I do not believe in the principle; but if I did I would not vote for a bill that enacted such glaring injustice.

I am opposed to the amendment, therefore, not only on the ground that it grants pensions for mere services without taking into account at all the character of the service, the value of the service, or the length of the service, but because it discriminates unjustly in favor of the soldiers of the Mexican war and against the soldiers of the late war. I have said that patriotism is a duty and service in the defense of our common country an obligation resting upon us all, and I deny that any other motive inspired the soldiers of the Union Army to rally to the defense of the flag and country they loved. Nor are they asking as a body for pensions except for disabilities incurred in the service, and that I hold they are entitled to as a right. The representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, when before the committees of the House, advised against service pensions. If the principle of pensions for service is logically carried out, as it would have to be if adopted, it would add well-nigh $100,000,000 a year to our present large pension-roll. Have gentlemen considered what must necessarily be the final result of the adoption of this principle?

The principle is wrong and we always err when we depart from sound principles; but so long as we adhere to the sound principle of granting pensions only for disability, and disability arising out of the service, we will keep on safe ground.

This and other amendments grant pensions for disability not arising out of the service or having any connection with the service. On what principle is one entitled to a pension for a disability not incurred in the common service of the country?

When you adopt such a principle and pension for disability in no way connected with the service you are setting out upon an unknown sea and no one can tell where you will land. But so long as we adhere to the sound doctrine of pensioning for disability and for disability arising from the military service we are on safe ground and consistent with safe public policy, and I do not believe any other policy to be safe. To follow the principle adopted in the Senate amendments, as the gentleman from Indiana says, is a pure gratuity. I will go farther, and say that it is taking from one to give to another.

The other amendments I am in favor of, as they embrace substantially what I have indorsed and what this House has already in part passed upon.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced agreement to the conference requested by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had appointed as managers of said conference on its part Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. RANSOM.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that he had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River, at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota; when the Speaker signed the same.

MEXICAN PENSION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will take the floor and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. I wish to say a word, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who has just taken his seat, in reference to the principles he has announced as those which should govern this House in the action which it is about to take on the amendments sent to us from the Senate. I hold that a pension for service has been recognized ever since we had a Government. I am not talking about precedents. I care nothing for precedents. It is the law we want, and we are here trying to pass a law which will give a pension, a small pension of $8 a month, to the men who fought seventy-odd battles for their country and carried the flag of the nation into a foreign land, to the very capital of Mexico. It is a pension which has been long delayed.

The objection of the gentleman I say is not well taken, and the distinction is not made against the Union soldier and in favor of the Mexican soldier, but on the contrary, if there be a distinction at all, it is made in favor of the Union soldier and against the Mexican soldier. Why, sir, the Congress of the United States voted to pension for merit—to give for service a pension to every Revolutionary soldier who had fought under the flag during the days of the Revolution. They first voted when they were poor that the soldier must swear he was not worth more than $100 before he could receive a pension; but the country soon got ashamed of that and it was given up, and the nation then, rising in its power and majesty and anxious to do justice to our Revolutionary heroes, said, We will pay every one of them a pension for service. So, too, the United States passed a law to pension the soldiers of the war of 1812. It was wise and just to do it, and the soldiers who had served in the war of 1812 received a pension.

So, too, should these soldiers who fought the battles of the country in the Mexican war receive pensions. I care not about a little distinction of the number of days they fought. I say I will not measure their services, but will give it to every one who served in that war.

Here, now, comes this objection from the gentleman from Ohio, who says that you must not pension these Mexican soldiers. In my judgment the gentleman is drawing it too fine. I believe that we ought to take a broader view of the subject than that. I am willing not only to pension the Mexican soldiers, but every Union soldier who served in the war for the life of this country; and the time will come, I think, when the people of this great nation will see the justice of it and demand that that gratuity shall be given them by this Government.

I believe the time will come when the people of this country will combine together and that spirit of justice will dawn upon the nation that will pension not only the Mexican soldiers, but, as I have said, every soldier of our wars, and that we will not be bankrupted, either, by it. This great nation with all of its vast resources will be able to pay the pensions. You ask me how. Lay an income tax upon large fortunes and pay it in that way. That is one plan. But whether you do or not there will be a thousand ways discovered to pay it. This pension bill will be passed. You may vote it down to-day, I hope you will not, but it will be passed and every Union soldier will be pensioned in time; and then the Government instead of being broken and bankrupt will prosper and grow under the blessings of Almighty God, and in the consciousness of a good action and an honest and just performance on our part of the duties of legislators.

Under these conditions this land in place of becoming poor will grow richer and richer. There is no use to talk to me about the doing of an act of justice to the gallant soldiery of this country making paupers of you. Does the distinguished gentleman from Ohio believe that this nation will be thereby pauperized? Look at its vast resources; look at this magnificent country with its 50,000,000 of people, and tell me it will be impoverished and broken because of this pitiful sum that you allow to the gallant defenders of our country. Mr. Speaker, I never can be brought to believe anything of that kind.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no desire to consume any further time of the House, and therefore, if there be no desire to discuss this question, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 55, not voting 92; as follows:

So the motion to concur in the Senate amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. VALENTINE, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

After careful consideration of the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Fitz-John Porter," I herewith return it with my objections to that House of Congress in which it originated. Its enacting clause is in terms following: "That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers, and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial, promulgated January 27, 1863," &c.

It is apparent that should this bill become a law it will create a new office, which can be filled by the appointment of the particular individual whom it specifies, and can not be filled otherwise; or it may be said with perhaps greater precision of statement that it will create a new office upon condition that the particular person designated shall be chosen to fill it. Such an act, as it seems to me, is either unnecessary and ineffective, or it involves an encroachment by the legislative branch of the Government upon the authority of the Executive. As the Congress has no power under the Constitution to nominate or appoint an officer, and can not lawfully impose upon the President the duty of nominating or appointing to office any particular individual of its own selection, this bill, if it can fairly be construed as requiring the President to make the nomination and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the appointment which it authorizes, is in manifest violation of the Constitution. If such be not its just interpretation, it must be regarded as a mere enactment of advice and counsel, which lacks in the very nature of things the force of positive law, and can serve no useful purpose upon the statute-books.

There are other causes that deter me from giving this bill the sanction of my approval. The judgment of the court-martial by which more than twenty years since General Fitz-John Porter was tried and convicted was pronounced by a tribunal composed of nine general officers of distinguished character and ability. Its investigation of the charges of which it found the accused guilty was thorough and conscientious, and its findings and sentence were in due course of law approved by Abraham Lincoln, then President of the United States. Its legal competency, its jurisdiction of the accused and of the subject of the accusation, and the substantial regularity of all of its proceedings, are matters which have never been brought in question. Its judgment, therefore, is final and conclusive in its character.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recently declared that a court-martial such as this was is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases. Its judgments, when approved, rest on the same basis and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest. It follows, accordingly, that when a lawfully constituted court-martial has duly declared its findings and its sentence, and the same have been duly approved, neither the President nor the Congress has any power to set them aside. The existence of such power is not openly asserted, nor perhaps is it necessarily implied, in the provisions of the bill which is before me, but when its enacting clauses are read in the light of the recitations of its preamble it will be seen that it seeks in effect the practical annulment of the findings and the sentence of a competent court-martial.

A conclusion at variance with these findings has been reached after investigation by a board consisting of three officers of the Army. This board was not created in pursuance of any statutory authority, and was powerless to compel the attendance of witnesses or to pronounce a judgment which could have been lawfully enforced. The officers who constituted it in their report to the Secretary of War, dated March 19, 1879, state that in their opinion "justice requires * * * such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the positions of which that sentence deprived him, such restoration to take effect from the date of his dismissal from the service."

The provisions of the bill now under consideration are avowedly based on the assumption that the findings of the court-martial have been discovered to be erroneous. But it will be borne in mind that the investigation which is claimed to have resulted in this discovery was made many years after the events to which that evidence related, and under circumstances that made it impossible to reproduce the evidence on which they were based.

It seems to me that the proposed legislation would establish a dangerous precedent, calculated to imperil in no small measure the binding force and effect of the judgments of the various tribunals established under our Constitution and laws.

I have already in the exercise of the pardoning power with which the President is vested by the Constitution remitted the continuing penalty which had made it impossible for Fitz-John Porter to hold any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States. But I am unwilling to give my sanction to any legislation which shall practically annul and set at naught the solemn and deliberate conclusions of the tribunal by which he was convicted and of the President by whom its findings were examined and approved.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 2, 1884.

[The reading of the veto message was received with loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the requirement of the Constitution the objections of the President will be entered at length upon the Journal.

Mr. SLOCUM. Is a motion in order that the bill be now put upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to submit the bill for the action of the House, unless some other motion be made with reference to it.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the bill be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill? upon which, according to the Constitution, the vote of the House shall be determined by the yeas and nays.

Is it desired to have the bill read?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think we had better have it read.

The SPEAKER. It is the right of the gentleman to have the bill read. The Clerk will report the bill to the House.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Whereas the board of Army officers convened by the President of the United States by special orders numbered 78, headquarters of the Army, April 12, 1878, to examine into and report upon the case of Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, having by their report of March 19, 1879, stated that, in their opinion, "justice required at his (the President's) hands such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and restore him to the positions of which the sentence deprived him, such restoration to take effect from the date of dismissal from the service;" and

Whereas the President, on the 4th day of May, 1882, remitted so much of the sentence of said court-martial remaining unexecuted as "forever disqualified the said Fitz-John Porter from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States:" Therefore, that justice may be done the said Fitz-John Porter, and to carry into effect the recommendation of said board,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, and, in his discretion, to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That said Fitz-John Porter shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance whatsoever prior to his appointment under this act.

The SPEAKER. Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill?

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 168, nays 78, not voting 78; as follows:

So the House, on reconsideration, agreed to pass the bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. KASSON and others objected.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey. I withdraw my vote in the negative, as I am paired with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Being paired with my colleague [Mr. BOYLE] I withdraw my vote. He would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. BENNETT. I was in attendance on a conference committee by order of the House. I ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request of the gentleman to be permitted to vote on that ground.

Mr. HART. The gentleman from North Carolina and I were paired. We came in together. I, supposing he would be permitted to vote, voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request under those circumstances.

Mr. HAMMOND. I object. The pair will protect the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] says he voted.

Mr. HAMMOND. He can withdraw his vote.

Mr. HART. I withdraw my vote.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HANBACK with Mr. COOK, on this vote.

Mr. BISBEE with Mr. BEACH, on this vote.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. OCHILTREE, on this vote.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM, on this vote.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. HART, on all questions, until further notice.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. BLACKBURN, on this vote. Mr. RUSSELL would vote "no," Mr. BLACKBURN would vote "ay."

Mr. GEORGE with Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, on this vote. Mr. GEORGE would vote "no," Mr. JONES would vote "ay."

Mr. HARMER with Mr. HEPBURN, on this vote.

The SPEAKER. On this question the "yeas" are 168; the "nays" are 78. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDEMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Pending that I move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question on the motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 110, noes 43.

Mr. BRUMM and others called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to secure order.

Mr. RANDALL. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. CANNON. I have the right to rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If the House shall take a recess until to-morrow we can then resume the consideration of the Mexican pension bill and dispose of it early in the day. If we adjourn we will spend all day to-morrow trying to get it up. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 40—more than a sufficient number.

Mr. BBOWNE, of Indiana, addressed the Chair. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I simply rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will put it in the form of a parliamentary inquiry, and I make that inquiry with the very best of motives in the world. I want to know if the House should adjourn what will become of the bill we have been considering in regard to Mexican war pensions?

The SPEAKER. It remains on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. A majority can reach it. It was reached by a majority vote this afternoon, and the same majority can reach it again.

Mr. CANNON. If you take a recess you will reach it to-morrow with the same rights it has now; but if you adjourn it will take all day to get to the Speaker's table against the filibustering tactics on the other side.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 129, nays 97, not voting 98; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

During the call of the roll,

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rules, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CONNOLLY: Petition of J. C. Coon and S. P. Coleman against the passage of the news-copyright bill—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOCKERY: Petitions of soldiers and sailors of Daviess County, Missouri, in support of certain House bills prepared by their comrades of Union City, Ind.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GOFF: Petition of Hon. Joseph S. Miller and others, citizens of Wheeling, W. Va., remonstrating against the Government engaging in the telegraph business, &c.—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HANCOCK: Papers relating to the claim of Martin Radich—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HILL: Petition of D. K. Bowker, and 500 other soldiers of Ohio, praying for the passage of a law pensioning all honorably discharged soldiers of the late war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON: Petition of Charles E. Nowlen—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MCCOID: Petition of J. C. McKell and others, of Burlington, Iowa, against passage of bill to carry into operation the reciprocity treaty with Mexico—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MORRILL: Petition of Noah C. Brandon and 200 others, of Blackford County, Indiana, soldiers of the war of the rebellion, asking for pension legislation—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OSSIAN RAY: Petition of James Butler for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. J. D. TAYLOR: Petition of citizens of Steubenville, Ohio, against passage of bill to carry into operation the reciprocity treaty with Mexico—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. J. D. WHITE: Petition for an Indian commission, by John Beesom, of Talent, Oreg.—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WILKINS: Resolutions of ex-soldiers of Gratiot, Licking County, Ohio, relative to pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the memorial of Axline Post, No. 290, Grand Army of the Republic, Zanesville, Ohio, relative to pensions—to the same committee.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 3, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives accompanying a House bill. The title of the bill and the action of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 2, 1884.

The President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Fitz-John Porter," with his objection thereto, the House of Representatives proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message from the President of the United States accompanying the bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

After careful consideration of the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Fitz-John Porter," I herewith return it with my objections to that House of Congress in which it originated. Its enacting clause is in terms following: "That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers, and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial, promulgated January 27, 1863," &c.

It is apparent that should this bill become a law it will create a new office, which can be filled by the appointment of the particular individual whom it specifies, and can not be filled otherwise; or it may be said with perhaps greater precision of statement that it will create a new office upon condition that the particular person designated shall be chosen to fill it. Such an act, as it seems to me, is either unnecessary and ineffective, or it involves an encroachment by the legislative branch of the Government upon the authority of the executive. As the Congress has no power under the Constitution to nominate or appoint an officer, and can not lawfully impose upon the President the duty of nominating or appointing to office any particular individual of its own selection, this bill, if it can fairly be construed as requiring the President to make the nomination and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the appointment which it authorizes, is in manifest violation of the Constitution. If such be not its just interpretation, it must be regarded as a mere enactment of advice and counsel, which lacks in the very nature of things the force of positive law, and can serve no useful purpose upon the statute-books.

There are other causes that deter me from giving this bill the sanction of my approval. The judgment of the court-martial by which more than twenty years since General Fitz-John Porter was tried and convicted was pronounced by a tribunal composed of nine general officers of distinguished character and ability. Its investigation of the charges of which it found the accused guilty was thorough and conscientious, and its findings and sentence were in due course of law approved by Abraham Lincoln, then President of the United States. Its legal competency, its jurisdiction of the accused and of the subject of the accusation, and the substantial regularity of all of its proceedings are matters which have never been brought in question. Its judgment, therefore, is final and conclusive in its character.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recently declared that a court-martial such as this was is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases. Its judgments, when approved, rest on the same basis and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest. It follows, accordingly, that when a lawfully constituted court-martial has duly declared its findings and its sentence, and the same have been duly approved, neither the President nor the Congress has any power to set them aside. The existence of such power is not openly asserted, nor perhaps is it necessarily implied, in the provisions of the bill which is before me, but when its enacting clauses are read in the light of the recitations of its preamble it will be seen that it seeks in effect the practical annulment of the findings and the sentence of a competent court-martial.

A conclusion at variance with these findings has been reached after investigation by a board consisting of three officers of the Army. This board was not created in pursuance of any statutory authority, and was powerless to compel the attendance of witnesses or to pronounce a judgment which could have been lawfully enforced. The officers who constituted it in their report to the Secretary of War, dated March 19, 1879, state that in their opinion "justice requires * * * such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the positions of which that sentence deprived him, such restoration to take effect from the date of his dismissal from the service."

The provisions of the bill now under consideration are avowedly based on the assumption that the findings of the court-martial have been discovered to be erroneous. But it will be borne in mind that the investigation which is claimed to have resulted in this discovery was made many years after the events to which that evidence related and under circumstances that made it impossible to reproduce the evidence on which they were based.

It seems to me that the proposed legislation would establish a dangerous precedent, calculated to imperil in no small measure the binding force and effect of the judgments of the various tribunals established under our Constitution and laws.

I have already in the exercise of the pardoning power with which the President is vested by the Constitution remitted the continuing penalty which had made it impossible for Fitz-John Porter to hold any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States. But I am unwilling to give my sanction to any legislation which shall practically annul and set at naught the solemn and deliberate conclusions of the tribunal by which he was convicted and of the President by whom its findings were examined and approved.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 2, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is now under reconsideration. The question is: Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? Is the Senate ready for the question? As two-thirds are required to pass the bill against the objections of the President, the yeas and nays will be called on the passage of the bill. Senators, as many as will agree that this bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, will as your names are called answer "yea;" the contrary, "nay."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PALMER (when Mr. CULLOM'S name was called). I was instructed to state for the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] who is sick, and who is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], that if he were here, while acknowledging his pair, he desires to go on record as voting "nay."

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that a pair with one person is not the character of pair that should be recognized in this case. My colleague ought to be paired with two. I suppose some other Senator will agree to pair with him.

Mr. PALMER. I see the reason for the statement of the Senator from Illinois, but I did not know the rule of the Senate in regard to double pairs, or two for one.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose another Senator will be willing to pair with my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER]. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of California, (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If they were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). To make one pair equal to two on this question I made a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. But for that pair I should vote "yea."

Mr. BECK (when Mr. WILLIAMS'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent, but he is paired upon this question with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. My colleague would vote "yea" if he were here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. Upon political questions I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is absent, but it has been arranged that my pair shall be transferred to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. I therefore vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent from the city on account of illness and is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 27; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted in the affirmative, the bill fails to become a law.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to be indulged for a moment while I say a word personal to myself. I was detained for half an hour this morning in business at the Departments, and upon my arrival at the Senate Chamber half an hour after the Senate convened I found that the vote had been taken on the veto of the President of the Fitz-John Porter bill. Not wishing to seem to have avoided a vote on a bill which has attracted so much attention in the country, and having had no reasons presented to me why I should change the opinion I entertained in voting upon the proposition formerly, I wish to say that had I been here I should have voted to have the bill become a law, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to move at this time that the House be requested to return the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War, which passed the Senate with an amendment. My object is to get a committee of conference, inasmuch as the bill can not be reached in the House as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON presented resolutions adopted by Memorial Post, No. 216, Grand Army of the Republic, of Cresco, Iowa, in favor of the recommendations made by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of any measure which will establish a governmental monopoly of the telegraph business; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN presented memorials of citizens of Danville and La Salle, Ill., remonstrating against Government control of the telegraph; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of ex-Union soldiers, residents of Taylorville, Ill., San Francisco, Cal., Pontoosuc, Ill., Noble, Ill., Terre Haute, Ind., Arcola, Ill., and Scott County, Indiana, favoring general legislation in behalf of ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Salt Lake City, Utah, praying a donation of land for cemetery purposes from the Fort Douglas military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM AT SAINT CLOUD.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to make a favorable report upon the bill (H. R. 6657) granting the consent of Congress to the Saint Cloud Water-Power and Mill Company to construct a dam across the Mississippi River at Saint Cloud, Minn., and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (1529) authorizing the Saint Cloud Water-Power and Mill Company to construct a dam across the Mississippi River at Saint Cloud, Minn., reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

LEGISLATIVE ACTS OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6409) to validate and cure defects in certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, reported from the Committee on Territories yesterday morning.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEES ON DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

Mr. CONGER. By instructions from the Committee on Commerce I report back the bill (H. R. 6925) to amend sections 4381 and 4382 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to fees levied and collected from the owners and masters of vessels in domestic commerce, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend paragraphs numbered 6 and 7, respectively, of section numbered 4381, so as to read as follows:

Sixth. For certifying manifests and granting a permit for a licensed vessel to proceed from district to district, 10 cents.

Seventh. For receiving a certified manifest and granting a permit on the arrival of such licensed vessel, 10 cents.

Paragraphs numbered 6 and 8, respectively, of section numbered 4382, are severally amended so as to read:

Sixth. For certifying manifest, including master's oath, and granting permit for vessel to go from district to district, 10 cents.

Eighth. For receiving manifest, including master's oath, on arrival of a vessel from one collection district to another, whether touching at foreign intermediate ports or not, 10 cents.

Paragraphs numbered 7 and 9, respectively, of section 4382 of the Revised Statutes are repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 1036) to provide for the construction of the Michigan and Mississippi River Canal and to cheapen transportation, and to accompany the report with a resolution of the committee, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senator from Nevada be instructed to report to the Senate Senate bill 1036, with amendments, favorably, for the consideration of the Senate at its next session, to be accompanied by a written report, to be filed at the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator from Nevada desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Let it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution be read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, the Chair understands, is a resolution of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir; accompanying the report merely.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose there should be an order authorizing the Senator from Nevada to make a written report at the next session as the bill is reported now.

Mr. INGALLS. No bill has been referred by the Senate to the Senator from Nevada. Bills are referred to committees, and as such they are dealt with. The resolution, I understand, was agreed to by the committee. It has no place on the files of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not speaking of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I was speaking of it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I understood the resolution first as he does, but on the second reading I understood it to be an authority to report the bill now, to be considered by the Senate hereafter.

Mr. ALLISON. And also authority to make a written report at the next session, which I suppose could not be done unless the Senate gave the authority.

Mr. HOAR. It is done by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the Senator from Nevada will be placed on the Calendar. The resolution appears to be merely an order of the committee directing him to report the bill, but it also embraces leave to be obtained to file a written report at the next session. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1457) to legalize the incorporation of national trades unions, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 254) for the relief of Arthur L. Fish, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins;

A bill (H. R. 1894) granting a pension to Clark Roberts; and

A bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1634) granting a pension to Clark Roberts, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4568) granting a pension to Andrew J. Konkle;

A bill (H. R. 836) granting a pension to John C. Fenscke;

A bill (H. R. 6786) granting a pension to Rivers Banks;

A bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup;

A bill (H. R. 4457) granting a pension to J. G. Crawford;

A bill (H. R. 2105) granting a pension to John A. Shackers;

A bill (H. R. 2091) granting a pension to Mrs. Rebecca Hall;

A bill (H. R. 2089) granting a pension to Margaret Wiggins; and

A bill (H. R. 1077) granting a pension to Sarah Miner.

MISSION INDIANS, IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 1250) for the relief of the Mission Indians, in the State of California, for action at present. If it causes any debate, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not want to object, but I hope the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators will allow the call for morning business to go through.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I yield to morning business if the Senator has any morning business to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senate consider at this time the bill indicated by him.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice now, having the floor and not having to crowd off any one, that I shall object to the passage of any more bills until the morning business is disposed of.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2361) granting a pension to Mrs. E. S. Simpson, widow of Col. James H. Simpson, brevet brigadier-general, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2362) for the relief of Thomas C. Killie; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

FOURTH OF JULY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). If there be no further bills to be introduced, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. SHERMAN:

Resolved, That the Senate will meet at the usual hour on Friday, the 4th day of July instant, and after the reading of the Journal, and before other business is done, the Secretary of the Senate shall read the Declaration of American Independence and Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the suggestion of several Senators who think the reading of Washington's Farewell Address would be more appropriate on his birthday, the 22d of February, and as it has been read on that day in two or three instances in the history of our country, and it would occupy time now, I will modify the resolution so as to call only for the reading of the Declaration.

Never till during our civil war, so far as the records show or as is known or is recollected, did Congress meet on the 4th of July. During the civil war we did meet habitually on the 4th of July, but it was only on the ground that those who had control then believed that the business then requiring attention was proper to be done on the 4th of July. We have only met once since on the 4th of July, and that was in 1870, at a time of great political excitement. An effort was made to adjourn when the Senate met that day, but the session was continued—a long, exciting, and unpleasant session—on the 4th of July, 1870.

I do not doubt that to-morrow it will be well to sit, because the committees of conference are carrying on their business and I have no objection to sitting; but I think we ought to recognize by common consent the importance of the day and the fact that it is a national anniversary celebrated all over the United States, by reading that immortal paper which is the foundation of American independence. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a right to modify the resolution I believe. I modify it by striking out the words "Washington's Farewell Address."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify his resolution, and it is so modified. The question is on the resolution as modified, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will meet at the usual hour on Friday, the 4th day of July instant, and, after the reading of the Journal and before other business is done, the Secretary of the Senate shall read the Declaration of American Independence.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDNANCE AND GUNNERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted yesterday, but laid over under the rule; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. HAWLEY:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to inquire as to the capacity of steel-producing works in the United States to make steel of suitable quality and sufficient in quantity to furnish metal for guns of high power, and metal plates and other material for the construction of vessels of war and for the armor or sheathing for such vessels.

2. That said committee shall also inquire as to the character and sufficiency of machinery and machine-tools in the navy-yards, and also in private foundries and machine-shops in the United States, for the construction of engines suitable for vessels of war, and for manufacturing guns for the proper armament of such vessels and of the seacoast defenses, and for the purpose of constructing iron and steel ships of war.

3. Said committee shall also inquire into the best locations in the United States for manufacturing guns, engines, and armor for vessels, and for building iron and steel ships of war, and the best method of manufacturing and building the same, whether by the Government or by contract with private persons.

4. Said committee shall have power to sit in the vacation of the Senate at any place in the United States, to send for persons and papers, and to appoint a clerk and messenger, and may report by bill or otherwise.

5. The expenses of said committee, and of witnesses summoned before it, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to be certified by the chairman of the committee, and audited and allowed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does that come from any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was presented by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest to insert:

Clerk, stenographer, and messenger.

It may not be necessary to employ a stenographer or it may, to report some testimony. I move to insert after the word "clerk," in the third line of the fourth paragraph, the word "stenographer."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut modifies his resolution by inserting therein "stenographer," in the fourth subdivision, after the word "clerk," in the third line; so as to read:

Appoint a clerk, stenographer, and messenger.

The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), 1. That the Joint Committee on Public Printing is hereby instructed to examine into the numbers printed of the various documents, reports, bills, and other papers published by order of Congress, or of either House thereof, and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to report a bill in December next making such reductions in the numbers and cost of printing, and such changes and reductions in the distribution of said publications, as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and that the said committee is also instructed to investigate the printing and binding for the Executive Departments, executed at the Government Printing Office and at the branch printing offices and binderies in the various Departments, and report a bill, in December next, making such reductions in expense and imposing such checks as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and said committee is further instructed to make any other investigations calculated in their opinion to reduce the cost of the public printing, and report the result thereof; and the said committee is hereby authorized to summon and to examine experts and witnesses, and to call upon the heads of Executive Departments and the Public Printer for such information regarding the preceding matters as they may desire; and any expenses necessarily incurred in making the investigations aforesaid shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress.

2. Said joint committee is hereby authorized to sit during the recess for the purposes of the first section hereof and in the discharge of its usual duties.

Mr. HAWLEY. This resolution, though not formally reported from the Committee on Printing, is virtually from the committee, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and myself, now constituting all the committee here, have agreed on it.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will remember, as the Senate perhaps will, that this is the concluding section of the sundry civil bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which was stricken out on a point of order. This provides for the same work that was ordered in that section.

The second section of this resolution is substantially the usual resolution passed at the close of every session, giving the Printing Committee authority to sit during the recess, which is always necessary as to certain matters of business.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY ACCOMMODATIONS.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress is hereby continued, and authorized to sit, if found necessary, during the coming recess of Congress, and that the expenses, if any, shall be paid from the appropriation for special and select committees.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, and that the necessary expense thereof be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent funds of the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move to take up House bill 1798.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will not be in order until the call for resolutions is concluded. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to put a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair in regard to the resolution just passed. Does that resolution authorize the Committee on Rules to sit anywhere but in Washington?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary question.

Mr. HOAR. I notice the last authority of that kind authorized the committee in terms to sit elsewhere. I suppose, of course, the Committee on Rules will regard themselves as compelled to sit in Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If there be none, that order is closed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, be taken from the table and now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill 1798.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to remind the Senate that last night notice was given that this morning on the conclusion of the morning business the Pension Committee desired the consideration of pension cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I desired to state that, while I should be very glad to help the Senator to get up his bill, and will as soon as the pension bills are out of the way, I think we ought to proceed with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 40, noes 7.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

Mr. PLATT. I propose to strike out from the fifteenth section the words which precede the word "and," in line 244.

Mr. HOAR. Including the word "and?"

Mr. PLATT. Yes, including the word "and," striking out these words:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China, and Chinese, whether subjects of China or any other foreign power; and.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. The Chair would suggest that the word "That," at the beginning of the section, should stand.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I modify the amendment by leaving in that word.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The amendment proposed is not in harmony with the decision of the circuit court of the United States for California, which was that a Chinese laborer from a jurisdiction other than that of China is a Chinese laborer within the meaning of the act. The circuit court in California decided that such a case came within the act. Other courts have made contrary decisions. If the law does not contain a provision of this sort, and is not so settled, Chinese laborers will come into the United States without restriction by merely taking up their residence in another country than China and then proceeding to the United States. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, and that the bill will be passed precisely as it came from the House.

Mr. PLATT. The words "subject of a foreign power" I apprehend do not mean merely residence in a country other than China, but do mean a naturalized subject of a foreign power.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PLATT. I will hear a suggestion.

Mr. FARLEY. One of the judges of the Supreme Court, Judge Field, has decided that Chinese from any other country than the Empire of China when coming to this country may be subject to the provisions of an act like this. I know there has been a conflict of opinion in the courts in reference to that matter. One of the judges of the Supreme Court passed upon that question in California, I understand that opinion has been concurred in by the entire court, but there has been no action taken on it. That is one of the difficulties we have had in California in reference to this very question. Chinese shipped from other ports than ports within the Empire of China come to California, and therefore it is important that this clause should be inserted.

Mr. PLATT. I am not familiar, as perhaps I ought to be, with the decision to which the Senator from California refers. I doubt very much, however, whether Judge Field or any other judge has decided that the act as it now stands prevents a naturalized subject of Great Britain or other foreign power from landing in this country simply because he happened to have been born in China. I do not know but that there is a decision to that effect, but I doubt it.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The decision of Judge Field is that the act applied to the Chinese as a race, without regard to the country in which they might be domiciled or the country of which they might be subjects; that the act applied to this people as a race; and it strikes me that that answers the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. If the decision has gone that far it is certainly unnecessary to incorporate it in this bill; but Judge Field, I apprehend, whatever he may have decided, did not decide that it was right to ingraft in any law a provision of this character.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say that the circuit court in Massachusetts, on full argument, Judges Lowell and Nelson concurring, have decided that the act, which is based in terms upon the treaty with China, being entitled an act to carry out the treaty with China and nothing else, does not include anybody but Chinese subjects.

Mr. PLATT. But here we propose to go still further. Having enacted a law upon the theory that we had a treaty with China which permitted us to enact such a law, we propose to go still further now, and to add to that law a provision which will prevent the landing here of naturalized subjects of Great Britain and of any other country with whom we have no such treaty which would prevent there being landed in the United States. I think we have gone quite far enough in this matter; and we had better not go so far as to say that the subjects of Great Britain protected by her can not land in the United States because they happen to have been born in China.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose in the last day or two of the session to enter anew into a debate of this general policy. This is a bill to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese and citizens of other countries. It rests in my judgment upon sheer barbarism; and the order which has just passed to read the Declaration of Independence to-morrow I infer was passed because in the opinion of its mover the majority of the Senate had not read it.

I wish only to reaffirm my disapprobation of this legislation and the principle on which it depends, and to state that in my judgment the American people will repent in sackcloth and ashes one day the policy they are inaugurating.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. PLATT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON]. On this question I am not advised how he would vote, and I withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand I have been paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but I am informed that he would vote "yea" if present, and so I cast my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—43.

Allison,	Cullom,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Logan,	Ransom,
Blair,	Farley,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Butler,	Garland,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Call,	Groome,	Miller of Cal.,	Slater,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,

Conger,	Ingalls,	Pike,

NAYS—12.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Lapham,	Morrill,
Brown,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Platt,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Wilson.

ABSENT—21.

Anthony,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Walker,
Camden,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Williams.
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,
Frye,	Jonas,	Sabin,
George,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,

So the bill was passed.

CATHARINE H. GLICK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, deceased, returned from the House of Representatives at the request of the Senate. On the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] it will be laid on the table for the time being, if there be no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar, under the eighth rule, is in order.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3056, being Order of Business 523.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of pension cases.

Mr. FRYE. This bill will not take a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

The question being put, there were on a division—yeas 12, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. FRYE. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted. If there be no objection the Chair will count the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not allow unanimous consent to be given unless there is a quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ascertain that by unanimous consent without a call of the Senate. [Counting.] A quorum is present.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to consider unobjected pension cases, and also the following cases, which all stand upon substantially the same ground, Order of Business 604, 605, 764, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 826, and 891, which are all pension cases.

Mr. PLUMB. Are those adverse reports?

Mr. BLAIR. Those cases all stand upon substantially the same ground, whether or not the needy widows of officers of high rank like admirals of the Navy and generals of the Army who rendered long and distinguished service shall receive an increase of their pension to $50 per month, and the decision of a very few will suffice for the whole.

Some of these cases standing upon substantially the same ground are reported favorably by the committee; other exactly similar cases are reported adversely, just according to the constitution of the committee, which was almost equally divided, at the meeting when the case happened to be reported. The committee felt that these cases had better be submitted to the consideration of the Senate and uniform action taken with reference to them all. We have already passed some five or six like cases during this session, and this list which I have made comprises all that remain upon the Calendar; and by incorporating them with the unobjected cases substantially all the pension business will be disposed of.

Mr. PLUMB. If there is to be any preference given to special cases

I hope it will not be given to those already getting pensions and already getting much larger pensions than the average pensions, but that we shall address ourselves to pensioning people who have no pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. That is precisely what has been done all session.

Mr. PLUMB. Let us relieve those who are willing to take a minimum pension, and who are not so socially intrenched that they can besiege us to do that, which we know to be unjust to the great body of the tax-payers, raising the pensions of those who are getting $30 to $50 when others are getting only $8 or $10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of pension cases on the Calendar reported favorably, and also——

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state what the Senator from New Hampshire desires, after which he will ask if there be objection. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of pension bills on the Calendar reported favorably, and, if the Chair correctly understands, also the list of other cases which the Senator from New Hampshire has read. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the last clause; I have no objection to the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases and also the list which I have sent to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent, as it changes the rule in respect of the order of business. Except by unanimous consent the Senator from New Hampshire can only move to proceed to one case at a time.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I move to proceed to the cases favorably reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that private pension bills favorably reported be now considered.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this to displace the regular order of business at 1 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Senator ask for the consideration of unobjected cases.

Mr. BLAIR. I prefer to ask for the consideration of cases favorably reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

Mr. BLAIR. Is a motion to that effect in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion is not in order except to proceed to the consideration of one bill at a time.

Mr. FRYE. The shipping bill that I tried to get up would have been through before this time.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be, but some of these cases need to go through as well as the shipping bill. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order on a motion to take up a bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can we have the bill read for information?

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that in the world.

Mr. GROOME. Nor has any one else.

Mr. COCKRELL. No one else has.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider in their order on the Calendar the pension bills reported favorably. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAIR. I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair believes that the case moved by the Senator from New Hampshire is the first.

NEWPORT SEWER.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask leave at this time to make a report from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, if there be no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am directed to report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 2041) granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is very important that the bill should be acted on at this session, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered now. It is only four or five lines, and there can be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is only four or five lines. There can be no objection to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill,

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 6 to strike out "regulations" and insert "conditions;" and at the end of the bill to add the following proviso:

Provided, That such conditions shall be accepted by the city of Newport before the work herein authorized shall be commenced.

So as to make the bill read:

That the city of Newport, R. I., is hereby granted the right to construct and maintain a sewer for drainage purposes through or across the breakwater at Goat Island, subject to such conditions as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That such conditions shall be accepted by the city of Newport before the work herein authorized shall be commenced.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM H. FORNEY of Alabama, and Mr. THOMAS RYAN of Kansas managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM C. OATES of Alabama, Mr. BENTON MCMILLIN of Tennessee, and Mr. SERENO E. PAYNE of New York managers at the conference on its part.

INTERNAL-REVENUE PROSECUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on House bill 6370. The message from the House will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 3, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. OATES, Mr. MCMILLIN, and Mr. PAYNE be the managers of said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. GARLAND. In the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who reported the bill to the Senate, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. LOGAN, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. HARRIS were appointed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chairs lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, returned from the House of Representatives. The action of the House on the Senate amendments will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 3, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDALL, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. RYAN be the managers of said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

THERESA CROSBY WATSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first pension bill on the Calendar favorably reported is Order of Business 764, being House bill 103.

The bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Theresa Crosby Watson, widow of James M. Watson, late a commodore in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 a month from and after the passage of this act, subject to all the other provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to explain to the Senate the attitude of this case. This is a House bill, passed by the House, giving to the widow of Commodore Watson a pension at the rate of $50 per month. The Senate Committee on Pensions reported the bill favorably with an amendment reducing the amount to $30 per month. It is, as I said before, one of a series of cases. Some are reported one way and some are reported the other way by the committee. It was the understanding with the committee that the question whether cases of this kind such as we have here should pass at the rate of $50 per month should be submitted to the Senate.

This widow is now between 50 and 60 years of age. She is poor. She is dependent upon her own manual labor for a living. In addition to the ordinary infirmities of age she is disabled by a broken hand, which occasions great difficulty and pain in the process of writing, to which she is obliged to resort as the only means by which she can earn money for her own maintenanee.

The almost universal practice of the Government has hitherto been to give in cases of this kind to the widows of officers of long and eminent service $50 per month, when in addition to the ordinary elements in such cases is to be found that of poverty, absolute need, which is the case here.

During the present session some six cases involving precisely the same principle have been reported to the Senate by the committee, all of which have been passed. Some were reported favorably; some were reported adversely. For my own part, I am entirely unable to see upon what principle we can discriminate against the few remaining cases which are before the Senate.

I do not know that I care to say anything more. The long and eminent service of the husband of this woman and her dependence upon her own personal labor are conceded facts. There is no controversy in the committee upon that subject. The question really is, shall we use these widows as we have used the widows of other officers under like circumstances? If so, the amendment of the committee, which in this case is one of reduction, should be disagreed to. Other cases, so far as I know no more meritorious, are before the Senate where the committee report in favor of granting a pension of $50 per month. I see no reason for a discrimination here.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill or to the amendment, as may be deemed best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That pensions heretofore or hereafter granted to widows of soldiers of any war in which the United States is engaged, from and after the passage of this act, shall be at the rate of $12 per month, instead of $8 per month, as now provided.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The subject-matter embraced in the amendment is one that will probably have the unanimous concurrence of this body and of the other House, that the widows of all the soldiers who served in any war in which the United States was engaged shall be pensioned at the rate of $12 per month instead of $8. An attempt has been made to incorporate that and make it the law this session. It was placed on the Mexican pension bill, it is true, but the uncertainty attending the fate of that bill in the other House renders it necessary that this clause should be placed upon some bill which may probably pass. It is a plain, simple proposition that the widows shall receive $12 per month, and there is no better place to put it than on a bill which proposes a pension at a large amount according to rank.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to offer this as an amendment to the amendment of the committee, or does the Senator desire it to come in elsewhere in the bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I suggest to the Senator to withhold his amendment until the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Probably that would be as well. I desire to move it as an amendment to the bill instead of to the amendment now pending.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the Senator temporarily withdraws his amendment, but I may as well say what little I wish to say in regard to it now as at any time.

The Senator is aware, for we have wrought together in that field in the committee and elsewhere, that I am as strongly in favor of pensioning the widows of the soldiers of the country at $12 a month as he is. He has also alluded to a fact, which it seems to me is a sufficient reply to his motion to amend the bill in the way proposed, that the Senate has already discussed and passed a bill to that effect which has gone to the House for its concurrence, and I observe by yesterday's proceedings that the House is likely to pass the bill which gives this relief to the widows of all the soldiers of the country.

It is therefore superfluous and quite inimical to this private bill to attach an amendment of this description to it. It is a House bill, coming like the others that I have mentioned here, almost every one of them, from the House. Unless we act finally upon it, it undoubtedly must fail for the session. The amendment can do no good to anybody and will hardly be likely to reach a conclusion so early as the Mexican pension bill itself, for that will be decided at this session probably, while if this bill goes back with an amendment to the House it must be delayed until the next session.

For this reason, it being utterly useless in every point of view either to this widow or to the widows of the common soldiers, I hope that the amendment will be rejected whenever the question is taken upon it.

Mr. WILSON. There are a number of cases on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions without division providing for soldiers and widows who are not now receiving any pension, and in order that we may proceed to cases that will not excite discussion I am disposed, if it is in order, to object to the further consideration of this bill, so that we can proceed with those cases which will not excite discussion, and afterward take up bills for the relief of those who are now provided with pensions and yet whose cases will excite discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was informed by the President pro tempore when the present occupant took the chair that we were proceeding to the consideration of unobjected pension bills favorably reported. That being so, the objection of the Senator from Iowa will carry the bill over at present.

Mr. BLAIR. Unanimous consent was given to consider this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to throw this out of its place on the Calendar. I am willing that it should be passed over informally, retaining its place, but I do desire to have those cases against which there is no objection, and which will not excite debate, disposed of. Then we can take up the other cases.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM S. ROSECRANS of California, Mr. CHARLES H. MORGAN of Missouri, and Mr. JAMES LAIRD of Nebraska managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM S. ROSECRANS of California, Mr. CHARLES H. MORGAN of Missouri, and Mr. GEORGE W. STEELE of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside informally, so that we may proceed with the unobjected pension cases.

Mr. PLUMB. There will be time enough hereafter to consider pension cases. That is a class of legislation which will go through any way. I feel under constraint, having charge of this bill, to insist upon proceeding with it.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ascertain the precise condition of the case which was being discussed when the Senator from Iowa rose. It was laid before the Senate by unanimous consent, and it had proceeded considerably in consideration when he rose to interpose an objection, if it was in order. I inquire of the Chair if under these circumstances the objection can be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was informed by the President pro tempore of the Senate that the Senate was proceeding to consider unobjected pension bills favorably reported. If the Senate was proceeding to consider unobjected pension bills, the Chair thinks that the rule of objection applies here as under Rule VIII. That being so, the objection can come at any time, and the bill goes over under objection.

Mr. BLAIR. Then, if the ruling of the Chair is correct, I suppose there is nothing to do but to allow the bill to be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the unfinished business is now before the Senate, and the bill to which he refers has been passed from. The Senate is not now considering it; it is not before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. But I supposed that it might proceed to consider the bill at the present time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is occupying the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, whether it is in order now to move to proceed with the consideration of House bill 103?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it would be in order for the Senator from New Hampshire to move to postpone the pending order until to-morrow; and if that order is made, it will be in order for the Senator to move the consideration of any measure pending upon the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. May I be permitted to say a word just at this juncture, by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill before the Senate is debatable.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is very much better to have it understood that the bill which is regularly before the Senate is to go on. There will be plenty of time for all these pension cases before we get through, I think.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the regular order.

MARIA G. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. LAPHAM. I gave notice on Monday that at this time I should ask leave to submit some remarks on Order of Business 787, being a resolution to pay Maria G. Underwood $5,000 in full compensation for the time and expenses of her husband in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. What is the Senator's request?

Mr. LAPHAM. I wish about half an hour.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not feel as though I could yield for that purpose now in view of the responsibility that attaches to me in connection with the pending measure.

Mr. LAPHAM. Of course the Senator from Kansas is entitled to the floor, and I shall reserve my remarks until a later hour if the Senator desires.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not feel as though I could take the responsibility of yielding at this time.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same with the following amendment, namely: In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following:

"MISSISSIPPI.

"To Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, of Adams County, the sum of $35,556.17."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

ANGUS CAMERON,
CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
J. Z. GEORGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN B. STORM,
J. H. ROWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. MORGAN, in section 1, line 17, to strike out all after the word "forfeited," as follows:

And the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made; but nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited lands that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any laws of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest therein.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable.

SEC. 4. Any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands or any part thereof which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath, and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim is necessary to do complete justice in such cause the court shall direct that such further proceedings be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.

SEC. 5. The court shall, if it see fit, tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the cost of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree therein to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court for appeals in equity cases. And the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket, so that the same shall be speedily determined. But no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in the remarks that I submitted on this bill when it was before the Senate several days ago I was attempting to enforce two propositions. The first was that there is a duty resting upon Congress under the existing circumstances to declare a forfeiture of what are termed the unearned lands of the Atlantic and Pacific Railway Company. The second proposition is that after that declaration is made it is our duty to send the case to the courts without undertaking to shape the rights of any person by the force or weight of our legislation.

I predicate my opinion in regard to the right to declare a forfeiture of the land grants upon the fact that beyond the Needles, up the Pacific coast, the Needles being the place where the Southern Pacific and the Atlantic and Pacific unite, there is really no evidence of an intention on the part of this railway company to complete its road.

If I could be convinced that this company intended to build a competitive line from San Francisco down to the Needles, so as to give the people of California the advantage of the two lines, one the Southern Pacific and the other the Atlantic and Pacific, I should be willing to defer the forfeiture of this land grant at least to some future period of time. I should be willing to extend the time in order to enable this company to complete the building of that road. I would do this because I am a supporter of the doctrine that when the Government of the United States has made a dedication of property, public lands, for a great public benefit to great communities, such a dedication ought not to be lightly withdrawn, and as long as there is a reasonable prospect of carrying into effect the purpose of the original dedication it ought to be sustained. But in the absence of any expectation justified by the facts that this dedication of public lands will be availed of by this railway company for the benefit of those communities it was intended to benefit, I am willing to go with the committee for the forfeiture.

Against this view of the case very strong argument has been made and quite an array of persuasive facts has been presented. This company was represented before the committee by persons who made a number of important statements which it seems to me bear strongly against the equity of our conduct in the forfeiture of this land grant. The only question that the United States Government can make against this railroad corporation in respect of its non-compliance with the obligation imposed upon it under the grant is simply that it has not completed the railroad within the time prescribed in the charter. As far as it has built its road it is a good road, a very valuable road to commerce; it opens up a country of great importance, and without this railway that country would have remained a wilderness for years to come; and there are political advantages that the Government of the United States gains from the building of this railroad, as far as the company has built it, which are of a very important character.

One of the provisions of the grant was that the Government of the United States undertook to extinguish the Indian title and survey the land where the reservations of the Indians crossed the line of the road, which is practically the thirty-fifth parallel. Perhaps, in order to get that point distinctly before the Senate, I had better read the engagement of the United States in the act making the grant. In section 2 it was provided in the last clause:

The United States shall extinguish, as rapidly as may be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians, and only by their voluntary cession, the Indian title to all lands falling under the operation of this act and acquired in the donation to the road named in the act.

That is a positive engagement on the part of the Government, one that we can not set aside at will; and if we had this duty resting upon us, is it not really a condition precedent to our right to demand a forfeiture for non-compliance by the railroad company in the building of the road within the time prescribed in the charter?

We can not lightly set aside that provision. If it were an obligation between private individuals and I was arguing it before a court, I think I should be justified in holding that until the grantor of the land had complied on his part with the condition precedent of clearing this road of an incumbrance which he alone had the power to clear it of, he should not be permitted to insist on this question of time resting upon the fact that the railroad company had not completed its road within the time prescribed in the charter as a ground for the forfeiture of the grant. Whether that position is well taken or not, it is very strenuously urged in behalf of this railroad company. Counsel representing the railroad company before the committee brought up this question and we were obliged to consider it.

There is another provision in the charter touching the same subject. I will read it:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said company is authorized to accept to its own use any grant, donation, loan, power, franchise, aid, or assistance which may be granted to or conferred on said company by the Congress of the United States, by the Legislature of any State, or by any corporation, person, or persons, or by any Indian tribe or nation through whose reservation the road herein provided for may pass; and said corporation is authorized to hold and enjoy any such grant, donation, loan, power, franchise, aid, or assistance, to its own use, for the purpose aforesaid: Provided, That any such grant or donation, power, aid, or assistance from any Indian tribe or nation shall be subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

This company asserts that the United States Government not only have not removed the Indian reservations which cross their line of railway as projected and laid down on the map, but that they have actually put other wild and savage tribes of Indians across their line, and have given them what are called executive reservations, or reservations by executive order, which have prevented the company from even making surveys of their line of road. That is the claim.

In view of these statutes, and in view of this assertion on the part of this company, the question that I present, and the only one that I desire to present, is this: Shall we so legislate here as to deprive this company of the right to make these questions against the United States? I can state it more strongly than that: Can we so legislate as to prevent and estop the company from making these questions against the United States? When we demand a forfeiture of this land grant upon the ground that the company have not complied with part of the requirement of the charter to build their road within the time prescribed in the act, can we insist, have we the power to so frame our enactment as to preclude the company from raising that question and having it settled by a court? I do not think we can.

Here is what the company asserts in reply to this proposition:

The United States has not even attempted to fulfill its promise to extinguish the Indian titles. It has never commenced to put the land grant in condition to be sold, pledged, or to be otherwise utilized as a means of raising money for construction purposes. So far from doing so, it has still further encumbered these titles. In 1868-'69 it located the Cheyennes and Arapahoes directly across the prescribed route of the road in the Indian Territory, and guaranteed their exclusive right of occupancy. The warlike Navajoes were located over us in New Mexico and Arizona in 1868 with similar guarantees. Small reservations for other tribes and for Pueblo Indians have been created in our pathway and military reservations have been put across our route. These not only deprive us of the enjoyment of the land grant, but they also in the large areas covered thereby block our right of way and destroy our ability to take materials for construction. The War Department has ordered our tie-camps from the limits of military reservations created by executive orders long subsequent to our act of Congress, and only after long delay, extended argument, and consequent loss of time and money were such orders rescinded. The Interior Department has ordered our surveyors out of the Indian Territory, wherein our right to construct was guaranteed by charter and by treaty. The direct money loss consequent on this action exceeded $100,000, and long delays were incurred before such orders were rescinded.

Since the road was constructed in Arizona and the granted lands thereby earned the Government has established new Indian reservations upon same, and without apparent regard to the existence of our vested property rights therein. These are the Moqui, Suppai, and Hualpi reserves, which lie directly upon our grant, and the latter reserve reaching almost to our track.

The United States has equally failed to survey the lands. As will be presently shown, the company has pushed construction at such points and times as was possible to a business enterprise; and as the road progressed the company has pressed the United States to identify the granted sections by surveys and patents. This reasonable request has not been complied with. Failing to secure such action from the Government, the company has asked the Interior Department to either permit it to deposit the requisite moneys under the special deposit law, or to advance same as a credit upon the charges required to be paid upon issue of patents. Both requests have been denied. So that the Government has both failed to do what it agreed to do in the matter of surveys, and it has refused to allow the company to do same at its own cost.

As a body, the land grant is still largely unsurveyed along the line of constructed road. While the land grant, in that undefined condition, may be subjected to a general mortgage, there is no segregation of the particular sections inuring to the grant from the adjacent mass of public lands. An absence of identification exists. Hence the company is hampered in its location of stations, depots, and other permanent improvements; it can make no titles to purchasers; it can not invite settlements. A railroad and a wilderness are incompatible things and can not long co-exist. Either the wilderness must be subdued or the railroad must die of starvation. If land titles can not be perfected nor the ownership of lands be identified, the process of subduing the wilderness will be slow and perhaps impracticable.

That is what is asserted in behalf of this railroad company in resistance to our right to insist upon any forfeiture because of the lapse of time. I do not assume to decide this question between the railroad company and the United States; neither do I think that Congress ought to assume to decide it. It is a question of fact affecting the equities between these parties, equities that reach down to the bottom of the subject and present the legal question; also, whether we have now the right to declare this land forfeited by judicial sentence. But certainly I will not consent by the legislative declaration that is proposed in the House bill to so far affect the rights of this railroad company as to deny what they claim. I want the political declaration, or the declaration of public policy, to be made by the Congress of the United States of the forfeiture of the lands, so as to give the United States Government a standing in court, and then that the Attorney-General or the proper district attorney under his direction shall present his bill in equity in the nature of a bill of interpleader, and he shall take these different parties into court with their rights entirely unaffected by legislation so far as the value of them as it respects the title is concerned. Let them stand for what they are worth under the laws of the United States and upon the facts as they shall be established at the time of the trial in that court. As a member of the committee I have not assumed the duty or the authority to make a final decision of these facts or of what their effect would be upon the title and upon the equities of these parties. I prefer to leave that to the adjudication of the courts.

Mr. President, there are other reasons which operate against the policy I am advocating here of declaring a forfeiture of this land grant, which were presented for the consideration of the committee, and which I deem it to be my duty very briefly to present to the consideration of the Senate. The first is that the financial panic of 1873, which paralyzed trade and largely weakened the confidence of capitalists in venturing further investments in railroad building through undeveloped sections, retarded the company in its progress, a cause that might be assimilated without irreverence to the act of God, a financial condition which deterred men of large capital from investing their money in a wilderness country. The second point that they urge in this direction is this:

The continued failure of the United States to put the company's grants in condition for use by extinguishment of Indian titles as a basis for raising sufficient money for construction purposes naturally deterred capitalists from advancing necessary funds on the faith of a grant of lands which, because of existing Indian titles, the company could not then dispose of by sales to settlers, &c., and the period of actual enjoyment of which rested in the indefinite future. These causes combined forced the failure of the company, a result sought to be averted by earnest, repeated, but ineffectual appeals to Congress.

After having made their arguments they sum up certain conclusions which I will not read in extenso, but the substance of which I will state as being the ground which this company occupy in respect to the United States as they claim the facts and the law to be. First they say that—

The legislation of Congress applicable to this road should be construed as a whole. Undue effect should not be given to one provision of the law so as to make same inharmonious with other provisions. It should also be construed with reference to the history of the times when the law was enacted, in order to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of particular provisions.

That is certainly a very sensible and very reasonable request. We have found it necessary in order to build all the great lines of railway to connect the Atlantic and Pacific that we should give them additional powers, power to mortgage all their franchises after they had failed with the stock subscription system to get money enough to build their lines. The Government of the United States not only knew that these companies had failed to comply with the conditions subsequent in their contracts up to the time the power of mortgaging their estates was given, but the Government understood perfectly well the reasons for the failure, and that these companies were excusable in the eyes of the people of the United States for not having been able to comply strictly with the terms of the grant. So it was that the Government, finding that these roads could not be built simply by private contributions to the capital stock, as was at first hopefully expected, gave the Northern Pacific and the Texas Pacific and the Atlantic and Pacific the power to mortgage all that they had derived from the Government of the United States even down to the right of way and their franchises, for the purpose of inducing capitalists to come in and invest their money in the mortgage bonds.

We had stood by until we saw that these roads were a failure; we had stood by until various events had occurred which would have technically entitled us to insist on a forfeiture of the grants; and finding that failure was inevitable, that the forfeiture would result in the disappointment of that grand expectation of the building of these highways to connect these great oceans, the Government of the United States came in by this act of Congress, condoned and waived really and truly, not in terms but in effect, all previous causes and grounds of forfeiture, enlarged the powers of the corporations, and started them upon a new system, the old one having failed to supply the means to build the roads. The new system placed these railroad companies directly upon the confidence of the capitalists of the country, and gave to them what was considered a sufficient security for the payment of the bonds which they issued.

Now, I recall the attention of the Senate to the fact that when we gave them power in 1871 to mortgage their franchises and their property of every description for the security of bonds to be issued under the mortgage to realize money to build the road, we did not fix a period of maturity for those bonds. We allowed that to be fixed by an agreement between the railroad company and the bondholders, the men who loaned the money. If the Government of the United States, when it was making this offer to the capitalists of the world that they should have the security of this railroad company—all that it had built and all that it could build and all its property of every description, including its franchise—did not impose as one of the conditions of the mortgage a period of time within which the road should be completed, then it can not be stated that there is not strong ground at least for argumentation on behalf of this railroad company that we had waived the right to forfeit the lands if the road was not built within the time previously prescribed in the original charter.

I do not say that that is so. I do not take that view of the question. I will vote against that view of the question. I will vote that we have a right to forfeit these lands because they did not build the road within the period fixed in the original charter, in order to bring the question before the courts. Nevertheless by our votes we can not extinguish the argument that is made against this exercise of power, and I can not say to the American public that these people who are arguing in this way and in good faith are clearly in the wrong, and that I am still disposed to cut their claims up by the roots and not to hear them in a court of justice. If the Supreme Court of the United States or any of the other constitutional tribunals of this country shall decree that upon that state of facts it was the implied intention on the part of the United States to waive the ground of forfeiture mentioned in the original charter as to the question of time within which the road should be completed, then I want them to have the benefit of it, the right to it.

Here I will mention again the fact that this committee have not been empowered by the Senate of the United States to ascertain the facts affecting these grants in a judicial way. We have to take the representations made pro and con upon this question by gentlemen all of whom are interested, and in no sense of the word have we engaged in any judicial investigation of the rights of these parties. We have to gather the facts as I state them here to-day from the briefs made by the counsel, and from oral arguments made and statements made by interested parties before the committee.

As I understand the facts of this case, the time for completing the road was the 4th of July, 1878, twelve years from the date of the act. That was a rather short time, and I have a good deal of doubt as to the sincerity of the expectation of either party, Congress or the railroad company, that so long a line of road—nearly 2,000 miles long—should be built within twelve years. On the 20th of April, 1871, Congress authorized the company to mortgage everything, waiving previous causes of forfeiture, not expressly but by implication, and extended the period of control over the lands indefinitely so far as the mortgages were concerned.

The map of the general route was filed December 2, 1871, after this act authorizing the mortgaging of the lands had been passed. On January 30, 1880, a tripartite agreement was made and was followed by a mortgage. That was an agreement between two other railroad companies and the Atlantic and Pacific Company that, for the purpose of getting an outlet to the West over this road, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Saint Louis and San Francisco roads agreed that they would come in and guarantee the interest upon their bonds, and would actually mortgage their own income from their own roads in support of those bonds so as to give them currency in the market. That agreement was entered into January 30, 1880, and it was in pursuance of that agreement that the money was raised to build the road from Albuquerque out to the Needles. This was not an unlawful act, neither was it without hazard. It was exactly in line with a policy that the United States eagerly sought to carry into effect, of completing this great transcontinental highway.

A question was made before the committee, and I notice a question was made in a report made to the House of Representatives, that this railroad company, instead of commencing at one of its termini and building clear through in either direction, commenced in the middle of its route. Why, Mr. President, between Springfield, Mo., and Albuquerque there intervened the Indian Territory, through which they could not go. They were not permitted to go through there and the Government of the United States did not comply with the agreement to provide the means by which they should go through with their railroad, and this road would not have been built to-day, it would have been a physical impossibility to build it, had it not been for the fact that the two roads to which I have referred as having taken the bonds of this company found it convenient and necessary for their own business that the road should be commenced at Albuquerque and built west, they supplying the necessary transportation and carrying the materials, ties, rails, and things of that kind to the point at which the road could really be commenced to be built.

Twenty-five miles of road were completed by this company by the 27th of September, 1870—mark the date—only twenty-five miles. From the date of the charter down to the year 1870, on the 27th of September, this company had only actually built twenty-five miles of its own line. It had, however, bought a road leading from a point near Saint Louis to Springfield, which is now the Saint Louis and San Francisco road. They bought that road or got the control of it, and were afterward compelled to surrender it. That road included, they had built one hundred and twenty-five miles of continuous line by July 4, 1878, the period at which the charter was forfeitable.

There were only seven years, from 1871 to 1878, within which Congress expected a line of more than 2,000 miles to be built, if Congress really did not intend, when it gave the company this mortgaging power, to make a waiver of the condition in the original grant that the road should be completed by the 4th of July, 1878. Up to this date, since the 4th of July, 1878, a road has been constructed and equipped in first-class style, and has become a very important factor in the commercial intercourse of that part of the country, and of this part, too, with its nine hundred and sixty-four miles of railroad. It has got to be an immense trunk line. So, adding this to the road from Saint Louis to Springfield, there are now completed at least a thousand miles of railway.

When we come to average this through the period of thirteen years you will find that this company has built considerably more than fifty miles a year. It did not build fifty miles in each year, but when it got into a condition that it could work at all, could get materials from the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road and from other roads, then it went immediately to work and built the road with very great rapidity.

Now, taking this brief summary of facts together, is there not strong ground for the argument made by this company that the Congress of the United States in foro conscientiæ is bound to admit that it was a part of the intent and purpose of this Government in its dealings with this road not to insist upon the technical forfeiture running back to or commencing the 4th of July, 1878. If we had the right of forfeiture of the lands on the 4th of July, 1878, why have we not enforced it? Why has no bill been brought in here for the purpose of determining this land grant, cutting it off on the legal technicality which arises upon the recent construction of this act? I am not answering that question. Indeed, I have not undertaken to answer any question in this case except the single one that the Government of the United States, in obedience to the public demand I will say, ought to declare a forfeiture of this land grant for the purpose of giving to the company and to the United States Government a standing in court and a tribunal, so that they may go before it with their rights unimpaired by any influence of Congress upon them to change or give color to them in favor of the Government or in favor of the other party, and there have them settled according to law.

Now, Mr. President, we are to have a great deal of this work to do, it appears. I look with very great apprehension upon the view of this case and of the many similar cases which would involve the Senate of the United States day after day, and session after session, and year after year in sitting in judgment upon facts to be ascertained before committees and upon the great mass of intricate and involved and difficult law questions that must arise upon the numerous grants which it is now sought to set aside and to annul. We shall have enough to occupy this body for the next five years, if we do nothing else, in the consideration of all the intricate claims which must naturally arise in the disposal of these vast land grants. As I stated to the Senate the other day, the number of these conditional grants exceeds one hundred, not all forfeitable and not all being pursued, but a number of them are forfeitable; a number of them are severely attacked.

Now, what course are we to pursue in this matter? Are we to usurp to ourselves judicial functions for the decision of the facts and the law touching all of this great mass of grants, or shall we appeal to that tribunal which is provided in the Constitution for the consideration, determination, and execution of the rights of every person, whether a corporation or a private citizen—the judicial department of the Government? What have we got judges for if we intend to usurp their functions? Why do we have courts, if we, in obedience to popular clamor or demand, shall organize ourselves into a high court of first instance, a nisi prius tribunal, for the purpose of hearing facts and deciding law and coming to grave conclusions upon these important matters?

Mr. President, we are scarcely impartial; for after all the Congress of the United States stands closer to the Government and closer to the people than any other department of this Government, and we act in the name of the people and for their benefit continuously. Their impressions and their desires and their convictions are very largely ours, and it is proper that it should be so, for we are the representative branch of the Government of the United States. It is one of our noblest as well as one of our most useful functions that we are here to represent the demands of the country in respect of its policy upon all questions. But, sir, the representatives of the people who claim to own this land are not the men from whom we shall expect the most impartial judgment upon questions of this sort. We have a tribunal which is set apart under the laws of the United States, apart from the people. The judges hold their offices under a life-tenure. They are carefully and cautiously removed from all influences of a popular character. They are not expected to yield to popular impressions, and though there might be 50,000,000 people clamoring for the destruction of a man or his rights these courts are so organized as that we confidently expect that a single judge shall stand in the breach and give a man his rights under the Constitution and under the laws against the whole power of the people.

I do not wish, in an attempt to gratify any eagerness on my part to satisfy a popular demand, to put myself in the shoes of the judges of this land, and to take away from any corporation or from any human being the guarantees which we provided under our constitutional system for the protection of private rights. Let every man and every corporation, no matter how popular or how unpopular he or it may be, no matter what accusations can or may or have been brought against these people or against these corporations as being monopolists or land-grabbers or grasping tyrants, let them all have an opportunity to be heard in the courts of the country, in an impartial forum, and after full pleading and after testimony delivered upon oath, let their rights be decided upon. If need be, let the chancellor call a jury to decide issues of fact, so that the body of the country, as it is termed, may pass upon questions of this kind, and then no one can complain of injustice.

Now, as this is the first question that has been before the Senate, the first land-grant forfeiture, I believe, that has ever been considered in the light in which we are now considering this question, I appeal to the Senate of the United States that they will take pause upon this case, and that they will in this case set a precedent which we will hereafter follow, of providing a reasonable, expeditious, just, fair, and satisfactory method of trying every right that is claimed, it makes no difference how absurd it may appear to our minds, arising under the laws of the United States touching these grants. We have no right to seize upon the powers of the judges to decide questions because we think we may have the right to assume in our own opinion that these judges, when they come to consider the questions, would decide them in the way we think they ought to be decided by Congress. We have no right, as is attempted in the House bill before us, to proceed to dispose of the title to these lands after we have declared their lawful forfeiture. We have no right to say that the Government of the United States shall resume the title to these lands; for it may turn out even in collateral proceedings between other parties interested in these lands that the courts will say, "You have no power over the title." We have no right to say that we will seize upon the title of these lands, and that they shall be restored to the public domain by act of Congress. That may be one of the results of the judgment of the court whenever it is rendered. At the same time, when we give legislative expression to that result in advance of a trial we so far hamper and obstruct the judicial authority in passing upon questions of this kind that it can scarcely afterward be said to be freely and fairly exercised.

Mr. President, another thing we do in this bill which admits away an important feature of the whole case presented in the bill as the House sent it to us. We apportion this forfeiture, and we say that it shall apply only to those lands which are adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of the main line of the said road. There is no such language as that in this grant. The power of Congress to declare a forfeiture of these lands for non-compliance with the condition subsequent was not in the act granting these lands limited to those that might be conterminous with the uncompleted or the completed portions of the road.

We take the grant and cut it in two; we reaffirm it in part by act of Congress before we undertake to claim under its terms a forfeiture of another part. That is not legal consistency. It is equity, it is justice in our view of the case and in my view, as in that of everybody else. At the same time it is not a judgment pronounced as a court would pronounce a judgment upon that grant. It can not be. We have undoubtedly the right, if we have got the power of forfeiture, to limit the forfeiture to a certain portion of the land, which means simply that the Government of the United States, having a broader right of forfeiture than we choose to assert, will assert a forfeiture to a certain extent only. We have got the power to waive it, the power to relinquish, the power to abandon this right of forfeiture in this way; but still, what does it prove in respect of the legal consistency of our action? Why, sir, it proves that the grant itself may be apportioned as well as the right of forfeiture.

Now, the railroad company insists that there is an equitable apportionment of this grant, as when the company has equitably earned a portion of it it would be entitled to it under the decree of a court. Congress, when it cuts the grant in two and makes an apportionment of it in directing the forfeiture, necessarily admits that it is apportionable as to the cause or ground of forfeiture, and so we proceed to act. It is in this view that the claim arises in favor of the company that there is such a thing as an equitable compliance with the conditions of the grant in the absence of a technical compliance.

There is another thing that we do. Under the terms of this act we have the right to alter, amend, or repeal the charter, and we have also the right to declare the forfeiture of the lands because they were not earned by the 4th of July, 1878. But what do we do here? Instead of forfeiting all the property of this company and getting it into the possession of the Government so that it may execute another very important feature of this grant, we confirm the right of this delinquent company to the right of way and to land for stations, without saying how much land, through its entire length. Here we split the subject up; we confirm a part and we forfeit a part; we leave the right of way according as it has been established upon the map which was filed in the Department and approved there, and that right of way extends from Springfield, in Missouri, to San Francisco. That is a valuable right; and after we have granted it in the original act and confirmed it in this act we never can take it away. So, then, in the very act which we are considering we cut this grant to pieces, and we confirm to the company one of the most important features of it; we perpetuate this as a railroad company without the power of forfeiture hereafter, with the right of way extending from Springfield, in Missouri, to San Francisco, in California.

After having done that, perhaps it is very well for us to listen to some reasons that are urged and to give a little weight to the argument made on behalf of this company to the effect that there is an equitable apportionment of the right of forfeiture as well as of the property itself, and that when we have slept upon our rights and have not insisted upon the right of forfeiture we have waived it, and when we have conferred new powers upon this company of a most important character in the very face of the fact that we had the right then to demand a forfeiture, we have condoned it. And so I conclude that it is well for us to listen to what they say, and let them have a chance to prove it if they can in a court of justice that the right of forfeiture may be waived and possibly has been waived.

Justice requires that we shall answer to the demand on their part that they shall have a fair trial in court, and that you shall not take the legislative ax and lay it at the root of the whole subject and cut it up beyond remedy. Sir, I must say that I abhor the idea of any legislative forfeiture merely because Congress has got the power, or because it may be sustained by popular clamor or pressure of any kind. I revolt at seizing upon powers that do not legitimately belong to us and using them for the destruction of any man's rights. Whether we acknowledge them or not, if he honestly makes claim to them it is our duty to relegate the subject to the judicial tribunals in order that they may be there considered.

This company make another very important point. They say that under the express provisions of this charter the Government of the United States never reserved the right of forfeiting these lands so as to recall the title back to itself; that it made a permanent dedication of these lands to a public use, and that after that dedication was thus permanently made the title was irrevocable by act of Congress. I do not assert here, it is none of my business to assert pro or con, that that point is well taken in law and upon the facts of this case, but I should be a little surprised if a court did not consider it a long time before it ruled against the company.

We remember those two leading and important cases in 9 Cranch which I had on my desk this morning but unfortunately sent away, in which the doctrine is laid down in the broadest possible form that where a government has made a dedication of property even to religious uses, and where afterward by an amendment of the constitution of the country it was forbidden that such dedications should afterward be made, still the prior dedications stand; and, under the doctrine of cy pres, if we could not find the particular person who is the donee of the benevolence we must find some person as near as possible in his shoes to execute the benefaction in behalf of religion. I refer to the cases of Terrett and others vs. Taylor and others, and The Town of Paulet vs. Daniel Clark, both in 9 Cranch.

It is not worth our while to belittle a question of this kind or to assume in the arrogance of our own power that there is nothing in it. We shall be confronted with it whether we wish or not; and in collateral suits that will spring up under the legislation proposed by the House of Representatives, costing millions of money and involving thousands of people in private litigation, these same questions will come back to us and find their way into the Supreme Court of the United States in spite of all we may do.

This question that I have just barely stated as one that is made by the corporation, of the irrevocability of the grant, the dedication of the lands, is one that we have got to meet. It may be true, and is true, that when the Congress of the United States has declared a great public use or benefit in this land grant, namely, the building of a railroad to connect the great oceans, and for distant communities, and has dedicated the lands to this important purpose—it is true that if this railroad company which is the beneficiary of the grant does not, can not, or will not build the road, Congress has reserved to itself and could exercise the power of having the road constructed by some other agency. Mr. President, it is also probably true that Congress can not recall that dedication so as to deprive the communities that were intended to be benefited of the advantages of the grant.

When Congress gave alternate sections of land along this immense and magnificent grant to the company and then put the other alternate sections at the double minimum, at $2.50 an acre, the policy was simply this, that the Government would lose nothing, because it would get double price for the land enhanced in value by the building of the railway; but further than that, above that, far beyond the interests of the individuals who might get a profit out of building the road or the interests of the present generation and reaching out to the interests of coming generations down the tide of time unmentionable, a great use and advantage were to accrue to these people from the building of this great railway.

Can Congress recall that grant and deprive these people of its advantages so long as there is power to execute it? I should not be at all surprised if the Supreme Court of the United States, after all, did not say that the Congress of the United States can not recall this grant and reclaim the land for other purposes, for the reason that words are not to be found in the grant to indicate that these lands are to revert to the United States. Such words are not in the grant. But the conditions operating in favor of the power of Congress to control the lands after the condition subsequent has been broken are only that Congress shall take this land for the purpose of completing this same railroad. That is an important question—one that I do not intend to debate, much less to attempt to decide it; but I am merely stating it as I am stating these other questions which arise under the act of Congress. I read section 9 of the act, and I desire the attention of Senators to this section, because this is an important point that the corporation makes in this case, and it ought to have fair consideration:

That the United States make the several conditional grants herein, and that the said Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the conditions hereof, and allow the same to continue for upward of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

If any man can find in that language or in any other language in this act a reservation, expressed or implied, that these lands were to return to the public domain I shall give him credit for great ingenuity. It may turn out that way after a judicial investigation, but I am not willing to assume in advance that Congress has reserved to the United States the reversion of these lands to the public domain when there is not one word in the grant that indicates there is to be a reversion.

On the contrary, the whole structure of the act, and every expression in it indicates that it was not the intention of Congress that the lands should revert to the Government upon the breach of the condition subsequent, but that they should remain dedicated to the great public use of building this railway. Congress pledged itself that it would take the land in case the road was not built and all the property and all the franchises which it had granted to the company and employ them for the purpose of insuring a speedy completion of the road. There is the continuing purpose distinctly announced, and the continuing obligation on the part of Congress acknowledged to accomplish that great result, and it is totally inconsistent with the idea that the lands are to revert to the Government of the United States in the sense of their becoming public lands and subject to public disposal instead of remaining lands dedicated to the purpose of building this great road.

I have gone as far as I desire to do in this matter. I know that the bill can be discussed as it ought to be. There has not been a more important bill in the United States Senate in twenty-five years, unless it was something connected with the civil war, than this is. We can not now properly argue it. The Senate is not disposed to listen to argument about it. Numbers of the members of the Senate are now concerned in conference committees in the different committee-rooms for the purpose of trying to bring together and close up the business of this long and laborious session, and it is really impossible for the Senate now to give to this, this first case of the kind we have had before us, the sort of consideration that it ought to have.

The best that I have been able to do with this great subject, in my own humble judgment, has been to offer the amendment which I had the honor to present, which, I will again state, is simply to stop the proceeding of legislation at the declaration of the forfeiture of the land grant, and then require the district attorney, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to take these parties into court and there to have the whole of their respective rights settled and adjusted.

The machinery which is provided in the amendment has been subjected to the scrutiny of the Committee on Public Lands, and I believe that there is no objection to it. I believe it is thought to be simple enough and convenient enough to secure the rights of every person in a rather inexpensive way and to accomplish one great desideratum, that is, in a single suit to be tried in the name of the United States and in the United States tribunals, to settle up the controversies which, if we leave this matter in the shape that the House has sent it to us, will spread out into innumerable litigations involving private citizens in extravagant and expensive lawsuits throughout the length and breadth of this great land grant. If we should accomplish nothing else by the amendment than to have one suit in which all these questions can be settled, that would be worthy the attention of the Senate of the United States, and I hope that sufficient attention will be given to the details of this measure to enable the Senate to understand the importance of it and the necessity of adopting the amendment I have had the honor to propose.

The Senate Committee on Public Lands, a majority of them, have reported a bill substantially as this amendment is. The committee are satisfied that there should be a general law upon this subject, and I should myself have moved a general law as an amendment to this bill but for the fact that I find it difficult to provide in a general law for the particular court which shall have jurisdiction. For instance, here is a court in California which might take jurisdiction of this matter; perhaps one of the Territorial courts might do it; a court in Arkansas could take jurisdiction because one branch of the road runs into that State; a court in Missouri could take jurisdiction. In the bill that is pending I propose that the court in the State of Missouri shall take jurisdiction, because I suppose that to be the nearest court to the completed portion of the line eastward, and perhaps nearest to the witnesses and all the evidence that may be required in the trial of the cause.

If I had proposed a general bill, in lieu of the amendment containing all the stipulations and provisions, I should have found difficulty in designating the court in which these various land grants are to be hereafter tried. So I thought it was best, and I thought it was my duty, too, to bring forward this amendment upon this particular bill, so that if Congress shall vote that this land is forfeited then a provision is put in the bill itself designating the court into which the case may be carried, and where these rights may all be settled. I only wish to secure a speedy and fair hearing of every claim and interest in these forfeited lands that anybody, claiming under the United States, may choose to assert in good faith; and I believe that all this can be accomplished under this amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Kansas to permit me to call up the fortification bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the bill under consideration be laid aside informally that he may call up the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Massachusetts moves to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT). Does the Senator from Massachusetts wish to have the bill read by paragraphs for amendment?

Mr. DAWES. Yes; let the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, such will be the order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 26 of section 1, after the word "projectiles," to insert "and for the expenses of experiments in the use of dynamite or other high explosive projectiles, and for;" in line 30, before the word "on," to strike out "draughtsman" and insert "draughtsmen;" and in line 31, after the word "bureau," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For the armament of seacoast fortifications, including the purchase of machine-guns of the latest improvement, the manufacture and conversion of heavy guns and carriages, projectiles, and for the expenses of experiments in the use of dynamite or other high explosive projectiles, and for fuses, powder, and implements, their trial and proof, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, including compensation of draughtsmen on gun construction while employed in the Ordnance Bureau, $520,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 32 of section 1, to insert:

For the preservation of Fort Marion, at Saint Augustine, Fla., and for the inclosure and improvement of the grounds attached to the same, said grounds to be in charge of the commanding officer of said fort, $5,000, said sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "determined," in line 44 of section 1, to strike out:

And to make the same known to the public without unnecessary delay, by public advertisement, so as to open the enterprise of producing cannon for the Government to public competition and encourage private manufacturers of cannon to produce, publicly test, and offer cannon of established endurance and power for sale to the Government.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And to report the same to Congress at its next session.

So as to make the clause read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the various calibers, lengths of bore, greatest and least admissible weights of guns for each caliber, together with the greatest and least weights of projectiles for each caliber, of all of the various calibers required for the service, together with the number of each caliber of gun required, to be determined, and to report the same to Congress at its next session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 52 to 78, inclusive, of section 1, in the following words:

And it shall be the further duty of the Secretary of War to devise and make known to the public liberal and fair regulations regarding the proof and purchase of guns, and upon receiving due notice that any projector or maker has a gun ready for proof, to promptly appoint officers to be present to witness the firing and report the facts not only as to the firing, but as to the materials of which the guns have been made, the plan and mode of construction, the powder, the projectiles, and the carriages, all to be particularly described with regard to all trial guns so offered for proof by private manufacturers who desire to produce armament by a conversion of obsolete guns on hand or according to special designs, and to secure for service only the best and most effective kinds, especially as to power and endurance under rapid firing, and at the lowest prices of those kinds which best meet all the requirements of service, as specified, of whatever material they may be made, whether such cannon shall be produced by private manufacturers or otherwise.

But in all cases, except where the trial guns are projected by officials and completed in Government establishments, the guns and all the expenses of the test must be provided and borne at the cost of the manufacturer of the guns, and are not to become chargeable against the United States unless it shall be established by the proof that the cannon of each kind and caliber, of whatever material they may be made, shall fully meet all the requirements of the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful, from and after approval of this act, to construct more than one rifled cannon of any particular material, caliber, or kind at the cost of the United States until one or more of such cannon of the required caliber has been publicly subjected to crucial test, including such rapid firing as a like gun might be subjected to in actual battle, for the determination of its endurance, and shall have stood such test to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, or such persons as he may select; and he is hereby authorized to select not to exceed five persons who shall be skilled in such matters, and unless it shall be demonstrated that such cannon is equal as to power and endurance to the best guns known to any military service, the guns shall not be purchased for the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The numbers of the remaining sections of the bill will be changed to correspond.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

RENT OF ROOMS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOWEN. I ask that the regular order may be further laid aside that I may call up a resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand the Senator from Colorado simply desires to offer a resolution for reference, and I have no objection.

Mr. BOWEN. It is Order of Business 321, being a resolution reported from the Committee on Contingent Expenses authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms and Architect of the Capitol to rent suitable rooms for the use of Senate committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the regular order may be further laid aside in order to consider the resolution indicated by him.

Mr. PLUMB. I thought that the Senator simply wished to introduce a resolution for reference.

Mr. BOWEN. I simply wish to have the resolution passed now. I withdraw the suggestion if there is any objection to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to yield for that just now. There will be some debate on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas objects.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the bill under discussion is one of a number of similar character which are upon the Calendar, and will come before the Senate for its consideration. As this is the first discussion in the Senate of the question of land-grant forfeitures, I shall not confine myself to the facts relating to this particular bill, or to the propriety of a forfeiture in this case, but shall submit some observations in regard to the history of Congressional legislation concerning the public domain, the origin of the land-grant policy, the question of land-grant forfeitures, and the power and duty of Congress in dealing with the question of forfeiture. I shall, however, endeavor to keep in mind the value of time at this late day in the session, and be as brief as possible.

On the 17th of April last my colleague, Mr. SLATER, delivered a speech upon the subject of land grants, in which he sought to contrast the management of the public domain by the General Government from the Revolution to the time when the Republican party came into power, with management under Republican administration, and in which by implication at least the supposed evils arising from the land-grant policy were charged upon the Republican party. I quote from that speech as follows:

It is only too apparent that within the past decade the area of public lands available for settlement is rapidly diminishing, and just in proportion as the public lands suitable for settlement diminish the improvident and wasteful prodigality of the bestowal of so many millions of acres of public lands upon great and grasping corporations is made apparent. * * *

Any policy that places needless restrictions or obstacles in the way of the people acquiring land for homes from the public domain strikes the best interests of the country in a most vital part. It was a most unfortunate mistake for the best interests of the people whose circumstances and lot in life made them seekers of homes upon the public domain when the Government was lured into the policy of making extensive grants of lands to corporations to aid in the construction of railroads. * * *

And after referring to the grants made during the first four years of a Republican administration, he continues:

For seventy-eight years, counting from the close of the Revolution, the public lands of the United States were regarded as a sacred trust, and were administered by the General Government, no matter what party for the time being held the reins of administration, as a trust, with a jealous care for the interest of the people who will ultimately make homes thereon.

It is true, sir, they were not given as homesteads to settlers, but they were placed within the easy reach of all on such terms as all could readily comply with, and by complying acquire land and homes.

And while admitting that the homestead law was the crowning act, the wisest and most beneficent of all the acts of Congress relating to the public domain, and after asserting that it was the only redeeming spot that he knew of in all the acts and doings of the Republican party in the administration of the public lands, he apparently sought to deprive the Republican party of the credit of that act by asserting that the "idea" was of Democratic parentage.

I have been curious enough to trace to some extent the origin and history of the land-grant policy and the history of legislation concerning the public lands to see what grounds exist for the claim that up to 1861 the public lands were "regarded as a sacred trust and were administered in the interest of the people," and I assert without fear of successful contradiction that an examination of the history of Congressional legislation concerning the public lands will show that the administration of the public domain by the Republican party, as compared with any previous administration, has been wise and judicious, in the interest of the settlers and of the public, and has been free from most of the mistakes and abuses which are to be found in the administration of the public lands during almost every previous administration.

The first act of Congress providing for the disposition of the public lands was an act of the Continental Congress, passed August 14, 1776, offering to receive and make citizens of deserters from the British army, and tendering each deserter fifty acres of unappropriated land in some one of the States. And from that date for a period of three-quarters of a century, running through the statutes of the United States is a series of laws, probably a thousand in number, authorizing the disposition of the public domain other than for cash, or by pre-emption or homestead methods, including donations to States and to associations and persons for a great variety of objects.

I find in what is known as the report of the public land commission the following table, showing the disposition of the public domain prior to June 30, 1880:

The disposition of the public domain from its origin to June 30, 1880, is estimated at 547,754,483 acres, partially accounted for under the following items:

	Acres.
Cash sales, which include pre-emptions, &c., and probably 30,000,000 or more acres accounted for under other acts, and commutation of homesteads, from establishment of land system to June 30, 1880	169,832,564.61
Donation acts, Florida, Oregon, Washington, and New Mexico	3,084,797.36
Land bounties, military and naval service	61,028,430.00
State selections (act of 1841) for internal improvements	7,806,554.67
Salines (salt springs and lands adjacent) granted to States	559,965.00
Town sites and county seats	148,916.91
Railroad land grants patented	45,650,026.33
Canal grants	4,424,073.06
Military wagon-road grants	1,301,040.47
Mineral lands sold since 1866	148,621.14
Homesteads, 3,000,000 (estimated) acres of which have been commuted and carried into cash sales above	55,667,044.95
Scrips enumerated	2,893,034.44
Coal lands	10,750.24
Stone and timber acts of 1878	20,782.77
Swamp and overflowed lands to States, selected or patented	69,206,522.06
Graduation act of 1854	25,696,419.73
Schools, seminaries, and agricultural colleges:
Sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, for schools 67,893,919
Seminaries and universities 1,165,520
Agricultural colleges, land in place 7,830,000
Withdrawn or patented	78,659,439.00
Area held under timber-culture act	9,346,660.93
Desert-land act	897,160.57

And various amounts disposed of under special acts, to be found in the Statutes at Large.

It was many years before the experience of the Government in attempting to dispose of the public lands led to the adoption of an efficient system. Instead of the laws being administered in the interest of the settler the policy of the Government for many years was to prevent entries upon the public lands until after their sale by the Government.

I quote the following from an article upon the public lands of the United States in a work recently published:

Meanwhile a new difficulty was to be met, and force was necessary. Gallatin recalls in his correspondence with Jefferson that from 1783 to 1786 immigration into the territory north of the Ohio was encouraged by the peacefulness of the Indians, and that a company was kept going up and down the Ohio from the Pennsylvania line to Cincinnati burning every cabin and in some instances laying down or burning the fences. This operation had to be repeated, and he knew of persons whose cabins were burned and settlements destroyed three times.

In 1785 an unsuccessful attempt was made to dispose of public lands through the States. In 1787 power was given to the board of treasury to move about the United States and sell surveyed lands at pleasure. By the act of May, 1800, an attempt was made to systematize the method of disposing of public lands. Land districts were created and the appointment of registers and receivers was provided for. Provision was made for the sale of surveyed lands at public vendue at not less than $2 per acre, one-fourth of the purchase-money to be paid down and one-fourth annually thereafter for three years. Under this system excessive purchases were made. The purchasers, or at least a large proportion of them, failed to meet the deferred payments. The lands reverted to the Government incumbered by tenants. Then Congress was flooded with applications for relief, and from 1809 to 1824 hardly a year passed without a relief act, suspending or mitigating the general provisions of the law affecting such lands.

In 1828, under the relief laws, 4,168,941 acres had been relinquished, discharging $13,778,347.37 of debt, and in 1830 the debt was wholly discharged. In 1835 the public lands became an object of wild speculation. In 1834 the sales amounted to $4,800,000; in 1835, to $14,700,000; and in 1836 to $24,800,000. The receipts for the lands consisted largely of notes of irresponsible banks. Land speculators organized a "bank," got it appointed a deposit bank if they could, issued notes, borrowed them, and bought land; the notes were deposited, they borrowed them again, and so on.

In due time the crash came, and nearly all the best lands in the market were controlled by companies or single proprietors who had purchased them for purposes of speculation. Under this state of things it became impossible to restrain settlers within the limits of surveyed lands. The population pressed beyond the surveyed limits to find lands suitable for homes not monopolized by speculators, and some measure became necessary to recognize these settlements and to give them priority of right. This was the origin of the pre-emption law. Up to the year 1840 the privilege of pre-emption was generally conferred by special laws of a temporary nature—relief bills, in fact—applying to a certain class of settlers. The pre-emption act of 1841 and supplementary act of 1843 conferred the right of pre-emption upon all qualified settlers under the act, but the right of pre-emption was confined to surveyed lands, and it was not until 1853 that the right of pre-emption was extended to unsurveyed lands.

From a very early period the public lands after they were surveyed were sold at public sale at dates fixed by law or by the proclamation of the President. By the act of March 3, 1803, providing for the disposition of lands belonging to the United States south of the State of Tennessee the President was authorized to make public proclamation of the sales, fixing therein a day or days for the same to take place, and such sales were to be made under the direction of the governor of Mississippi Territory, the surveyor of the lands and the register of the land office, the sales to take place where the land offices were "kept." By the act of April 24, 1820, it was provided that the public sales authorized thereby should be kept open for two weeks and no longer. No lands could be entered at private sale unless they had first been offered at public sale. This method of disposing of the public lands was kept up until the Republican party came into power.

It will be seen at once that under this system the choice lands were sure to be purchased by speculators. At the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, then a member of the House, introduced into that body a bill for the protection of settlers on the public domain, intended to give the settler ten years' preference over the speculator. The bill was as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 1st day of September, A. D. 1858, no public lands shall be exposed to sale by proclamation of the President until the same have been surveyed and the return thereof in the land office for at least ten years.

The bill was defeated by 78 votes against it to 73 in favor of it, only nine Democrats voting for the bill. Again, on the 20th of January, 1859, to the House bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands relating to pre-emptions, Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, moved to add the following section:

Be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no public lands shall be exposed to sale by proclamation of the President unless the same shall have been surveyed and the return of such survey duly filed in the land office for ten years or more before the sale.

The amendment was opposed by the Democratic party and especially by Democrats residing in the Southern States, and a motion was made to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, a reference that would have been its certain defeat. The motion was defeated by a vote of 92 to 90, and the amendment carried by yeas 97, nays 81, all the members except one voting against it being Democrats. But the bill as amended was defeated by a vote of 96 nays to 91 yeas, the Republicans voting unanimously for the amendment as they did for the bill as amended. Every Southern member except two, Mr. Blair, of Missouri, and Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, voted against the bill as amended. Only eight Democrats, all of whom were of the Douglas school, voted for the bill.

On the 1st of February, 1859, House bill 72, to secure homesteads to actual settlers, which had been referred by the House to the Committee on Agriculture and reported from that committee January 26, 1859, came up for action. A motion to lay on the table was lost by a vote of 113 nays to 71 yeas, and the House was forced to a direct vote. The bill was then passed—yeas 120, nays 76; the Republicans, without exception, voted solidly for the bill; of the Democrats, 60 out of 98 voted against it. The bill was defeated in the Senate by Democratic opposition without a vote upon its merits.

The next session, on the 5th of March, 1860, Mr. Lovejoy, from the House Committee on Public Lands, reported the Grow bill, to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, and on the 12th of March, the same year, it was passed—yeas 119, nays 66, the Republicans voting unanimously for the bill, while all voting against it were Democrats.

On the 17th of April, 1860, in the Senate, Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, as a substitute for the Grow homestead bill, which had passed the House, a bill granting homesteads to actual settlers at 25 cents an acre. When the bill came up for consideration Mr. Wade moved to substitute the Grow bill for it, which motion was lost—yeas 26, nays 31; yeas all Republicans but 3.

The Johnson bill passed the Senate on the 10th of May. The House refused to concur, and on the 19th of June the conference committees came to an agreement by which the House accepted the Senate bill with some amendments, the provision of the bill requiring payment for homesteads at the price of 25 cents per acre being retained. This bill was vetoed by President Buchanan June 22, 1860, as unconstitutional and unjust and unequal in its operations and pretended benefits, and as a measure which "will go far to demoralize the people." In the Senate the veto was sustained, 19 to 9, all the Republicans present not paired with Democrats on the question voting for the bill.

On the 4th of March, 1861, Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated President of the United States, and the Republicans, now in control of both Houses of Congress, hastened to redeem the pledge contained in their platform adopted at Chicago in 1860 by enacting the homestead law.

The homestead act is now the approved and preferred method of acquiring title to public lands. It has stood the test of over twenty-two years, and was the outgrowth of a system extending through nearly eighty years, and stands as the concentrated wisdom of legislation for the settlement of the public lands. It protects the Government, it fills the States with improvements, it builds up communities, and lessens the chances of social and civil disorder by giving ownership to the soil in small tracts to the occupants thereof. It was copied from no other nation's system. It was originally and distinctly American, and remains a monument to its originators.

ORIGIN OF THE LAND-GRANT POLICY.

To properly indicate the origin and growth of the land-grant policy a brief glance at the history of Federal aid for the improvement of rivers and harbors is necessary, as the policy of granting Federal aid to internal improvements grew out of the practice of appropriating money from the Federal Treasury for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Under the Articles of Confederation the only limitations upon the States to control commerce were, that duties should not be levied on the property of the United States, or either of them; that such control should not conflict with treaties of the United States already concluded or provided for, and should not prevent the transfer to other States of goods imported. By the Constitution the control of commerce was given to the Federal Government, and it was provided (article 1, section 10, paragraph 3) as follows:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, &c.

In the constitutional convention, September 15, 1787, after the control of commerce had been given to the Federal Government, the following amendment was offered:

No State shall be restrained from laying duties of tonnage for the purpose of clearing harbors and erecting light-houses.

And it being suggested that there were other purposes for which tonnage duties might be conveniently levied by the States, the provision was modified as it appears in the Constitution.

The intention of the framers of the Constitution appears to have been that each State should control entirely the improvements of its own seaports, levying tonnage duties for that purpose upon the commerce which should enter them, first obtaining the consent of Congress; and the practice for years was in accordance with that intention. During the first half-century after the adoption of the Constitution a great number of acts were passed by Congress authorizing States to levy tonnage duties.

The last act of that character I believe to have been the act of January 19, 1861, which revived and continued in force until the 3d day of March, 1871, so far as the State of Maryland was concerned, an act of Congress passed the 17th day of March, 1800, entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia," and which, it was recited, had by subsequent acts been continuously in force until the 3d of March, 1861.

Congress by an act passed April 2, 1802, made an appropriation for the erection of public piers in the Delaware River, and by an act passed February 15, 1819, made an appropriation for the survey of water courses tributary to and west of the Mississippi River, also those tributary to the same river, and northwest of the Ohio.

By an act passed March 3, 1821, Congress made an appropriation for certain harbor improvements on the coast of New Hampshire and Maine, and, in the naval appropriation bill passed the same day, made an appropriation for the removal of obstructions from the river Thames, in Connecticut. These isolated appropriations were the beginning of the system of river and harbor improvements by the General Government. Appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors were annually made by Congress with the exception of one year, 1848, from 1821 to 1862, and in some instances grants of land were made for like purposes. In the year 1826 the river and harbor bill assumed considerable proportions and included appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, or both, in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Delaware, Ohio, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Alabama, and Michigan.

Annually, from 1826 to and including 1838, river and harbor appropriation bills, embracing the principal rivers and harbors in the United States then used for commercial purposes, were passed. By the act of March 2, 1819, admitting Alabama into the Union, the policy of giving the States a portion of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their borders was inaugurated, and by an act passed March 2, 1827, granting lands to the State of Indiana to aid in the construction of the Wabash and Erie Canal, the land-grant policy was inaugurated.

All the States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution had seacoast and were engaged to some extent in ocean commerce. In 1791 Vermont was admitted, and subsequently other States having no seacoast, and the original conception of the powers and duties of the General Government as to improvements of rivers and harbors and as to internal improvements necessarily changed. As the burden of the tonnage duties levied by the States having seaports was indirectly borne in part by the citizens of inland States, the unfairness of appropriating them exclusively to river and harbor improvements, while the inland States received no aid from the General Government for internal improvements became apparent and the inland States began to demand appropriations for the construction of roads and canals. This was the origin of the internal-improvement system of the United States.

The first act of Congress granting aid to a work of this kind was passed in 1806, and was an act providing for the construction of a turnpike road, known as the Cumberland Road, at national expense, and, from that time forward, numerous bills for the construction of roads in the States and Territories were passed. The constitutionality of these acts was variously defended upon the ground of the powers of Congress "to provide for the common defense," "to establish post-roads," and "to pass laws for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," and on the other hand the constitutionality of such appropriations was warmly denied by leading statesmen, among others by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. But appropriations for internal improvements in great numbers were every year included in the general appropriation bills, and in this manner received the approval of the Executive.

The following table shows the amounts of appropriations for internal improvements under the different administrations mentioned:

Jefferson	$48,400
Madison	250,800
Monroe	707,621
Adams	2,310,478
Jackson	10,582,088
Van Buren	2,222,544
Taylor	1,076,500

I submit a statement showing land grants to the several States for railroad and canal purposes from 1827 to 1857; also a statement showing land grants to the several States for railroad purposes from 1853 to 1857, with additional grants for the same roads from 1864 to 1866.

* The act of June 2, 1864, enlarged the area within which the company might complete the quantity granted by the act of May 15, 1856.

These figures conclusively show when the land-grant policy was inaugurated and who was responsible for it. I have examined the debates upon some of the earlier bills making grants of lands to aid in the construction of railroads, and quote briefly from the remarks of some of the leading statesmen in both Houses of Congress upon the same to show what they thought of the land-grant policy and the reasons which then induced Congress to aid the construction of canals and railroads by grants of public lands.

On the 3d of May, 1848, the Senate having under consideration the bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way and a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the chain of northern lakes at Chicago, Senator Crittenden said:

Sir, I rejoice to see a portion of the public domain applied to such a purpose as this; for I do not know a more natural or more wise purpose to which it could be applied than to improve and settle the lands themselves. * * * And in regard to the constitutional question, it is a certain and undeniable fact that there has not been a President of the United States, there has not been an administration since the formation of the Government by whom an appropriation similar to this has not been sanctioned; not one administration from Washington down to this day that has not given its sanction to such a grant. Old Colonel Zane had a grant made to him for marking out the first foot-path in Ohio, and preparing the way for settlement. If anything can be settled by precedent this has been. * * * If anything can be settled by precedent, if anything can be fixed as fundamental law by the unanimous approval of the wisest men, such men as Washington himself and such Congresses as have existed since the formation of the Constitution, this is such a question. I have no doubt myself either as to the constitutional right of Congress to make the grant or the wisdom and sound policy of such a measure.

In the same debate, Mr. Benton said:

I have been long enough here to have voted for the original grant to the State of Illinois for the purpose of connecting Lake Michigan with the Illinois River by means of a canal. When I gave that vote I did not expect to remain in these councils until the object intended to be accomplished should be attained; I did not expect the good fortune of seeing the United States made into an island by a canal connecting the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Mississippi in my lifetime. But it has been done by the aid of a grant of land to the State of Illinois, and I presume without that aid the work would hardly have been undertaken, much less been accomplished; now, however, the work has been completed, and the United States is to-day—an island.

Leaving the Gulf of Mexico at New Orleans, or the Atlantic at New York, you may go as you choose around the United States without touching land. The result then of a grant of land to the State of Illinois by Congress has been prodigious; and even if there were no other advantageous result than the vast facilities afforded to our internal navigation, it well compensates us for parting with some acres of land over which this Government then wielded a barren scepter. I have no reason to regret that vote. I rejoice in it. * * * I do not, therefore, consider any of those grants as unprofitable; but, on the contrary, I fully concur in the opinion that a great public object is gained in the transfer of these lands from those by whom they are not cultivated to those by whom they are made productive. I shall with great pleasure vote for the bill before the Senate; and hope that the construction of the contemplated railroad will produce similar beneficial results to those effected by the canal.

Mr. Calhoun said:

The question in this case is a very simple one. We are authorized by the Constitution to dispose of the public lands. Here is a public improvement, projected either by the State or individuals in the State through which it will pass, and by which the value of the public lands will be enhanced. If, then, it will add to the value of our lands, ought we not to contribute to it? Would we not, as individuals, thus act? This is not a novel principle. It has been acted upon for more than twenty years. The case of the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan is a striking one. There alternate sections were given to make a canal, and I suppose I can with confidence ask the Senators from that State whether the lands reserved to the United States were not disposed of readily.

Mr. Breese (in his seat). Thousands of acres were disposed of which would otherwise have never been sold.

Mr. Calhoun. I have seldom given a vote the result of which gratified me more than the vote which I gave on that occasion. I then presided in that chair which you now occupy and gave the casting vote. I take to myself, therefore, some share in the credit of that magnificent improvement. Indeed I do not think there is a principle more perfectly clear from doubt than this one is. It does not belong to the category of internal improvements at all. It is not a power claimed by the Government as a government. It belongs to the Government as a landed proprietor. And I will add that it is not only a right but a duty, an important duty.

Now, what has been considered an equitable arrangement between the Government and the State which may undertake an improvement passing through the public lands? Long since it was agreed that the grant of alternate sections was a fair contribution on the part of the United States, considered as a proprietor, and from which the United States would be a very great gainer. It appears to me to be an equitable arrangement; and I doubt whether in any case, either of a canal or a railroad passing through the public lands, the United States will not be a gainer. To that extent I am prepared to go, be the road long or short; if it be long, you gain the more; if it be short, you gain the less; and you contribute in proportion to your gain.

Mr. Cass said:

The Federal Government is a great land-holder. It possesses an extensive public domain; and we have the power under the Constitution to dispose of that domain, and a very unlimited power it is. The simple question is what disposition we may make of the public lands. No one will contend for the doctrine that we can not give them away to a State. As the Senator from Kentucky has said, every President has signed bills asserting the principle that these lands may be disposed of by the General Government without restriction as to the purpose of such disposition. We may bestow them for school purposes, or we may bestow a portion for the purpose of improving the value of the rest. What right have you to sit still and see your lands growing in value through the instrumentality of individuals without rendering any aid in furtherance of that object? It is the settlement of the lands that makes them valuable. It is the settler who converts the howling wilderness into fruitful fields. It is the labor and enterprise of the settler that has given you in the West a magnificent empire, and one which has arisen within so brief a period that it is almost incomprehensible.

When I told the story in Europe that I had crossed the Ohio when there were scarcely 20,000 people in that country and that it now contained 5,000,000, they did not laugh in my face, to be sure, but they did not believe what I said. There is no parallel in the history of man, no such splendid tribute to human industry and enterprise, since the first man went out of the garden of Eden. It is not twenty-five years ago that I sat all night in a canoe at the head of the pond at Chicago, there being no human habitation in which we could obtain shelter from the mouth of the Illinois to the mouth of the Chicago River; and now it is one of the great highways of travel between the northern lakes and the ocean. Sir, I hope the gentlemen will put this upon its true ground, leaving out the constitutional question and taking alone into consideration what is your duty as land-holders in a new country—a country, too, which must derive its improvement from the industry and enterprise of your own population where every stroke of the woodman's ax redounds to your advantage.

The man who sits down with his family in the wilderness to make for himself a home evinces more moral courage than the man who goes into battle. No man who has not experienced the difficulties and dangers he has to encounter can estimate them.

On the 29th of April, 1850, the Senate having under consideration Senate bill No. 22, granting the right of way and making donation of land in the State of Illinois in aid of the construction of a railroad, Mr. Douglas said:

The bill proposes to grant the land in alternate sections, increasing the price of the other sections to double the minimum price. It is following the same system that was adopted in reference to improvements of a similar character in Ohio, Indiana, Alabama, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois in reference to her canal. It is simply carrying out a principle which has been acted upon for thirty years, by which we cede each alternate section of land and double the price of the alternate sections not ceded, so that the same price is received for the whole. These lands have been in the market from fifteen to thirty years; the average time is about twenty-three years; but they will not sell at the usual price of $1.25 per acre, because they are distant from any navigable stream or a market for produce. A railroad will make the lands salable at double the usual price, because the improvement made by the State will make them valuable. It is an old practice long sanctioned by the Government.

Mr. Clay, in the same debate, said:

I have no doubt, I can entertain no doubt, of the right of the General Government as one of the greatest—the very greatest—of land-holding proprietors, to appropriate a portion of that land for the purpose of making the remainder more valuable and available.

A great deal has been said about the trusteeship of the Government. It is true that all government is a matter of trust. Individual men are trustees created by Providence, bound to administer their faculties to the best advantage, not merely for themselves, but for their fellow-men. But if by the use of the term trustees it is proposed to qualify, limit, or restrain the trust so as to resemble the ordinary trusts that are created in the course of human transactions, I do not concur at all in that idea.

The Government is a trustee for the purpose of administering the affairs of the nation according to its best judgment for the good of the whole and all the parts of the whole. With respect to the State of Illinois—and I believe the same is true to a considerable extent with reference to Mississippi and Alabama, but I happen to know something personally of the interior of the State of Illinois—that portion of the State through which the road will run is a succession of prairies, the principal of which is denominated the Grand Prairie. I do not recollect its extent exactly, but it is, I believe, about three hundred miles in length and about one hundred in breadth. Now, this road will pass directly through that Grand Prairie, lengthwise, and there is nobody who knows anything of that Grand Prairie who does not know that the land in it is utterly worthless for any present purposes; not because it is not fertile, but for the want of wood and water, and from the fact that it is inaccessible, wanting all facilities for reaching a market or for transporting timber, so that nobody will go there and settle while it is so destitute of all the advantages of society and the conveniences which arise from a social state. And now, by constructing this road through the prairie, through the center of the State of Illinois, you will bring millions of acres of land immediately into market which will otherwise remain for years and years entirely unsalable.

Mr. Seward said:

What, then, is the best and highest interests of the people of the United States in regard to this domain? It is not to derive from it the highest amount of current revenue; it is not to accumulate in our coffers the highest and greatest amount of avails in the sales of the public lands which is attainable. But it is to bring them into cultivation and settlement in the shortest space of time and under the most favorable auspices. And why is this the best interest of the Government? It is because the power of the Government is increased just in proportion as population is extended over what now constitutes the public domain, and that the wealth of the Government increases in the same ratio as the increase of population, and that the taxable ability of the people for purposes of peace and war is increased by the extension of the population, and by the increase of wealth.

I can conceive it possible that it is more profitable, more conducive to the interests of the people of the United States, even in a fiscal or purely financial point of view, to make large appropriations from this domain for the purpose of enhancing their more speedy settlement than it would be to retain them in a miserly grasp for the mere purpose of revenue. It is therefore upon the ground that the most expedient and beneficial disposition of this portion of the public lands is to devote it to the construction of public roads beneficial to all the people of the United States, as well as to the States which are immediately traversed by it, that I am in favor of the principle of this bill and of all similar bills which are properly guarded in their provisions, and shall give them my most cordial and effective support. I hope that the bill will be passed.

On the 27th of June, 1864, discussing the Northern Pacific Railroad bill, Mr. Hendricks said:

The bill before the Senate proposes to encourage the construction of a very important railroad to connect the waters of Lake Superior with the waters of the Pacific Ocean. Everybody can see at a glance that it is a work of national importance. It proposes to grant lands in a northern latitude where, without the construction of a work like that, the lands are comparatively without value to the Government. No person acquainted with the condition of that section of the country supposes that there can be very extensive settlements until the Government shall encourage those settlements by the construction of some work like this. I do not think that a work of such national importance ought to be embarrassed in its passage through this body and through the House of Representatives by amendments proposing works that are comparatively local.

The bill granting lands to the Oregon Central Railroad Company was passed May 4, 1870. At that time Hon. J. S. Smith was Representative in Congress from Oregon. He was then and is now one of the ablest and most influential men in his party in the State of Oregon. While that bill was under consideration in the House, Mr. Smith said:

I want to pass this bill to-day and I do not care to make a speech. But I trust I shall have the attention of the House while I make a very brief statement. I wish, however, to say just this in reference to the matter: That this bill is in the interest of settlers or prospective settlers on the public lands through which this road is designed to pass. The road will be about one hundred and thirty miles long. Fifty miles of that distance the country is settled; for the remainder of the distance it is not settled, and is not susceptible of settlement unless means of communication through it such as are proposed by this bill shall be provided. The road ought to extend further up the Willamette Valley.

The bill introduced by me provided for one the whole length of the valley, and I had hoped to have it passed in that form. The committee failed to report in favor of an extension of the branch southerly, and I accept of what they have reported. A short road is better than none. The Willamette Valley, which contains two-thirds of the population of the State of Oregon, has no outlet to the sea but by the Columbia River. That river flows across the north end of this Willamette Valley. On the west, between that valley and the sea, a mountain range extends along its whole length. Through this range of mountains to the mouth of the river we have no road of any kind.

* * * * * * *

We want this road to give us an outlet to the sea at all seasons; and we want to open up the pass we have found through these mountains to the settlement. It is not a question whether by the passage of this bill this land shall be withdrawn from settlement, but the question is whether by the passage of this bill you will open up to settlement a region of country which otherwise never would be settled. It is a question whether it shall be occupied by settlers under the provisions of this bill or whether it shall remain a wilderness in the future as in the past, whether it shall be the home of a busy, thriving population, or continue to be the home of the elk and the bear.

For twenty-five years, Mr. Speaker, this land has been open to settlement, first, under a donation law, and now under the homestead law; and yet no man has gone there to settle. No white men ever went there until they went to find this pass for a railroad to the sea. The red man never lived there. It is a forest, an Oregon forest, such as is found nowhere else, perhaps, in the world. And no settler will ever go there unless there is a railroad through the pass connecting this Willamette Valley with the sea. In that event some of the smaller valleys will be opened to settlement. The lands are rich; the timber is abundant; it is valuable. But the land and the timber would remain in the condition they now are for a hundred years to come if this road is not built.

I have a letter in my hand from one of my constituents who settled in one of the valleys in the same mountain range further south, who has lived on this land for eleven years and has had a family grow up around him on it. His land it still unsurveyed; he can not have schools; he can not perfect his title; he is living there under the homestead law; is unwilling to remain and does not dare to go away for fear of losing his land. No man with a knowledge of the condition of the country and its future prospects would ever settle there in the absence of this railroad. Now, this grant is a limited one. It is barely sufficient to secure the objects in view; and I will state this, that every man in Oregon of both parties, whether along the line of this road or elsewhere, is in favor of this particular bill, and the man who votes against it here will do that people an injustice and a wrong.

Again—

Mr. SMITH, of Oregon. * * * Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has remarked in his very remarkable speech that there was no Democrat on the floor of this House who would dare to support land grants. I claim to be as good a Democrat as the gentleman from Indiana, and I am happy to be able to say that distinguished Democrats from that State who are as well acquainted with the public sentiments of the people of Indiana as that gentleman himself will vote in favor of this bill and they will receive the approbation of their constituents for so doing. This is not a party question and it can not be made such. This policy really originated with the Democratic party. The first land grant of any magnitude ever made in aid of internal improvements was made for the benefit of the State of Indiana, represented in part by the gentleman who moves to refer this bill. The Wabash and Erie Canal was constructed under just such a grant as is asked for this railroad in the State of Oregon. The first railway grant was to the State of Illinois, and the bill was introduced by Stephen A. Douglas, and supported by a majority of both parties in the House and in the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. SMITH, of Oregon. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. Two or three years ago when the Northern Pacific Railroad Company had forfeited its charter by the lapse of time, and consequently the entire grant of lands that the Government had made to it, the charter was revived and the land grant insured to them by an act that passed the House with but six Democrats voting against it.

Mr. BECK. On the 1st day of July, 1868.

Mr. SMITH, of Oregon. I am very glad to hear that. I wish to say one other thing in this regard. At least one, and I think more than one Democratic national convention incorporated in its platform a plank in favor of such grants. And yet the gentleman says that no Democrat can vote for a land grant.

Mr. President, I have referred to these earlier grants of lands to aid in the construction of canals and railroads, not for the purpose of condemning the Democratic party for inaugurating, or of excusing the Republican party for continuing the land-grant policy, but for the purpose only of showing that if, as some contend, that policy was wrong, the Republican party is not responsible for its origin. I do not condemn the policy. Looking at the great results which have flowed from it, I am ready to defend it. I believe that the most sanguine hopes of the authors of the policy and of its eminent supporters in Congress, among whom were Douglas, Benton, Calhoun, and Cass, have been more than justified. Sir, even now, with the light of experience, if I could claim for the Republican party the inauguration of the policy by which our vast territory has been made accessible and opened up to the landless for homes, and has been transformed from a wilderness to prosperous States and Territories, I should not hesitate to make the claim.

I believe that Congress has the constitutional power to aid works of internal improvement in the interest of interstate commerce, and that it is its duty to do so. And while it may be that in some of the acts granting lands to aid in the construction of canals and railroads the interests of the people have not been sufficiently guarded, I am not willing to condemn as wrong in principle, even indirectly, legislation which has been productive of so much good. There are no doubt grants which ought to be immediately forfeited because the works intended to be aided by Congress by the grants have not been commenced or have not been prosecuted in good faith, and by reason of delay the country has been settled up and circumstances have so changed that the inconvenience and loss to the public which would result from longer withholding the granted lands from the operation of the land laws would be greater than the public benefit to be derived from the construction of the road.

On the other hand, I believe that there are cases in which the construction of the works intended to be aided is being carried on in good faith, and the interests of the communities along the lines of the uncompleted portions of the roads as well as the public interests, would be greatly subserved by allowing the companies to complete their roads and earn the grants. Where settlers have gone into possession of unearned railroad lands and have improved the same under a well founded expectation that the road would be speedily constructed and that they would thus be enabled to secure the title to such lands from the railroad company, I am satisfied that the rights of all parties can be better secured by permitting the lands to be earned by the company where that will be done within a reasonable time. Forfeiting the grants and subjecting the lands to the operation of the land laws will not preserve the rights of such settlers. Many of them are not qualified to take lands under existing land laws; many of them have improved more land than they would be entitled to take under those laws if qualified, and no general provision for their relief can be made which will meet all cases, but in every act of forfeiture some provision should be made by which the title of such settlers to limited quantities of land improved by them is secured to them.

So far as questions of vested rights are concerned, the railroad companies stand before the courts and before Congress upon an equality with the Government, protected by law. The grant to a railroad company or other corporation is a contract between the Government and the company, and the right to modify, alter, or repeal it so as to affect property and rights of property does not exist unless reserved in the charter. These grants were not intended as gifts to the companies, and ought not to be continued for their benefit alone. The grants were made for the benefit of the public, in consideration of public benefits to be derived therefrom; and if proper to be made at the time, and the public interests demand their continuance, they should be continued. So far as rights of property have become vested by compliance with the conditions of the grants such rights are beyond the power of Congress. So far as equities have arisen by reason of circumstances that may have caused or may excuse the delay, such equities are proper matters for consideration.

As between the Government and the corporations, unless the public interest requires the continuance of the grants, I am prepared to vote for the forfeiture of every unearned land grant, and for the forfeiture of the unearned portion of every grant. But, until I am ready to condemn the policy inaugurated under the administration of Washington, and which received the sanction of nearly every subsequent administration until the Republican party came into power and the ardent support of the leading statesmen of every administration, I am not ready to admit that all unearned land grants should be forfeited upon the principle that grants of land in aid of internal improvements are wrong per se. The interest of the railroad company ought not to be a controlling question in determining the question of forfeiture. The test in my opinion ought to be, will the public interest be better subserved by the forfeiture of an unearned grant and the restoration of the land to the public domain than by permitting the grantee to comply with the conditions of the grant by the construction of the road and earn the grant? And as in the first instance the grant was made for the benefit of the public, the question whether it ought to be forfeited should be determined with a view of protecting the public interest.

Since March 4, 1861, a period of twenty-three years and over, forty-four acts have been passed by Congress granting lands to aid in the construction of railroads. During the period from September 29, 1850, to March 4, 1861, a period of less than eleven years, Congress passed forty-seven acts granting lands to aid in the construction of railroads. The grants made prior to 1861 were all made to aid in the construction of comparatively short lines of railroad located in Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. Nearly all these States had facilities for transportation by water. They had large populations. The public lands were accessible compared with the vast unpeopled regions west of the Rocky Mountains. The cost of railroad construction then was comparatively small, and the population and resources of the regions where the roads were to be constructed assured a remunerative business when the roads should be completed and open for traffic. The lands granted were valuable both on account of their quality and accessibility.

When the Republican party came into power the people of this country were demanding a transcontinental railroad. The party was pledged to Congressional aid for such a road. The policy of granting land to aid in the construction of railroads was, as we have seen, the settled policy of the Government, advocated by leading statesmen of all parties. The Pacific coast and the intervening territory west of the Mississippi was beginning to attract attention, and Congress wisely, as I think time has demonstrated, undertook by aiding the construction of railroads to open up this portion of our territory to settlement.

The circumstances were different from those under which previous grants had been made. The roads were of great length and extended through unsettled regions of the country. A large portion of the lands along the lines of the projected roads was worthless; and, owing to the distance from market and the total absence of the means of transportation, the whole territory was comparatively valueless.

The roads, it was well known, would be expensive to build, and when built would not for a considerable period have a remunerative traffic. Under these circumstances a grant of the same quantity of land that was made in some of the earlier grants would have been insufficient to insure the building of a road, and the grants were therefore necessarily increased in quantity, the Government reserved every alternate section, and the lands retained by the United States within the land grants became increased tenfold in value by the construction of the roads.

Out of the forty-four grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads made subsequently to March 4, 1861, twenty-nine were made to States as additional aid to companies which had received previous grants or to aid in the construction of new roads in the States of Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Kansas, the aggregate number of acres granted by these twety-nine acts being comparatively inconsiderable. The other fifteen grants were made to the following corporations: The Union Pacific, Kansas Division, Denver Division, Central Branch Union Pacific, Central Pacific, Western Pacific, Oregon Branch, Sioux City and Pacific, Northern Pacific, Southern Pacific, Atlantic and Pacific, Oregon Central, Texas and Pacific, New Orleans and Pacific, and the great bulk of land granted after March 4, 1861, was to aid these great transcontinental roads and their branches.

With the exception of some of the branches or divisions of the Union Pacific I presume the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was the most valuable of all these grants, and yet I venture the assertion without fear of successful contradiction that the first grant ever made in aid of the construction of a railroad, namely, the grant to the State of Illinois, to aid in the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad, of six alternate sections per mile on each side of the located line of its road, was of much greater, I think I can safely say several times greater, value than the magnificent grant, in quantity, made to the Northern Pacific Railroad for any number of miles of its road wherever selected upon its line equal to the length of the Illinois Central. In other words, the best part of the Northern Pacific grant, for a distance equal to the length of the Illinois Central road, although it is in the Territories, twenty alternate sections upon each side of the located line of its road, was not when made, and is not to-day, equal in value to the grant made to the Illinois Central.

I have seen it stated upon good authority that the land grant to the Illinois Central Railroad was so valuable that the road was entirely constructed out of the proceeds of the sales of its lands. The Northern Pacific Railroad within the limits of Montana Territory is about eight hundred miles in length, and the number of acres that it will receive under its grant in that Territory, if it secures the entire amount, approximates 20,000,000 acres.

I have what I consider good authority for saying that the amount of agricultural railroad lands within the limits of the grant of that company in the Territory of Montana does not exceed 2,000,000 acres, and that not exceeding one-third of the lands are valuable for any purpose whatever.

The attempted distinction between grants made to the State to aid particular improvements and grants made directly to corporations to aid in like improvements, does not affect the question of the propriety of the land-grant policy. It was the constant practice of the States to transfer such grants to corporations, and the practice was well known to Congress. The grants to corporations were in effect like those that have been subsequently made to such corporations as should be designated by the Legislature of a State.

In proposing to forfeit a railroad grant, the first inquiry naturally is, how far should the act of forfeiture, by its terms, extend? It seems to be supposed by some persons that a legislative declaration of forfeiture of a land grant will be conclusive as to the fact of the existence of a breach of the condition upon which the grant was made and as to the extent of its effect upon the granted lands. I do not believe any such doctrine. In my judgment an act of Congress declaring a grant forfeited is, in effect, a mere declaration of the intention of the Government to resume the grant for a breach of the condition, an act upon the part of the grantor which prevents the grantee from further complying with the condition of the grant, so as to make its title to that portion of the grant as to which the condition was unperformed at the date of the declaration absolute, but settling no questions of law or fact.

If Congress shall attempt to do more it will attempt to do an idle thing. Judicial powers have not been conferred upon the legislative department of the Government, and no act of Congress can deprive the grantees and their assigns of the right to resort to the courts of the country in some form to obtain a judicial construction of an act of forfeiture.

Whenever a claim is made to any portion of a land grant by any person claiming under the Government subsequent to the declaration of forfeiture, the original grantee, or parties claiming under the grantee, can resort to the courts for adjudication of the question of title. It is true that under existing laws the grantees upon a declaration of forfeiture can not sue the United States to obtain a construction of the act of forfeiture, and I agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that this is a practical denial of justice in all cases as to where there is an unsettled controversy as to the right of forfeiture or as to the extent to which it can be made, and that some amendment like the one proposed by him should be made to this bill and to all similar bills; but a much stronger reason and the controlling reason with me why some such amendment should be adopted is that if it is not done litigation will ensue which will involve thousands of settlers, and, in all probability, deluge Congress with applications for relief.

A charter granted to a corporation by act of Congress is a valid contract between the United States and the company. Out of a large number of cases in which this proposition is decided I quote from two. In the Binghamton Bridge Company (3 Wallace) the Supreme Court said:

> The Legislature therefore says to public-spirited citizens: "If you will embark with your money, time, and skill in an enterprise which will accommodate the public necessities, we will grant to you, for a limited period, or in perpetuity, privileges that will justify the expenditure of your money and the employment of your time and skill." Such a grant is a contract with mutual consideration; and justice and good policy alike require that the protection of the law should be assured to it.
>
> We have supposed if anything was settled by an unbroken course of decisions in the Federal and State courts, it was that an act of incorporation was a contract between the State and stockholders. All courts at this day are estopped from questioning the doctrine. The security of property rests upon it, and every successful enterprise is undertaken in the unshaken belief that it will never be forsaken.
> A departure from it now would involve dangers to society that can not be foreseen; would shock the sense of justice of the country, unhinge its business interests, and weaken, if not destroy, that respect which has always been felt for the judicial department of the Government.

Chief-Justice Shaw said in the case of Boston and Lowell Railroad Corporation vs. Salem and Lowell Railroad Company (2 Gray, 32):

> In addition to the law-making power, the Legislature is the representative of the whole people, with authority to control and regulate public property and public rights, to grant lands and franchises, to stipulate for, purchase, and obtain all such property, privileges, easements, and improvements as may be necessary or useful to the public, to bind the community by their contracts therefor, and generally to regulate all public rights and interests.
> It is under this authority that lands are granted, either in fee or upon any other tenure, that the uses of navigable streams and waters are regulated, the right to build over navigable waters, to erect bridges, turnpikes, and railroads, and other similar rights and privileges are granted and justified. * * * Were all such grants and stipulations repealable by subsequent Legislatures, because they are in the form of laws, then the unlimited power of the Legislature to alter and change laws—sometimes called, rather extravagantly, the omnipotence of parliament—would be a source of weakness and not of strength. * * * When such a contract has been made by the Legislature upon considerations of an equivalent public benefit, and where the grantees have advanced their money to the public upon the faith of it, the State is bound by the plain principles of justice faithfully to respect all grants and rights thus created and vested by contract.

The grant of lands made by Congress to aid in the construction of this road, and most of the Congressional grants to aid in the construction of canals and railroads, were grants in præsenti and conveyed all the right and interest of the United States therein, subject to the conditions named in the grant. When such grants were made of alternate sections of the public lands along the line of a proposed railroad, not located, the grant was in the nature of a float. Whenever the line of the road was definitely fixed the grant attached to specific tracts and became definite. Although a grant was in præsenti and vested the title in the grantee in fee—a qualified or base fee—at the date of the grant it may have been a grant upon condition subsequent and be liable to be determined by the entry of the grantor for non-performance of condition.

In the cases of the grants to the Northern Pacific, the Atlantic and Pacific, and the Texas Pacific Railroad Companies, in addition to the claim mentioned by the Senator from Alabama that the United States has failed to perform the conditions of the grant to be performed, it is strongly contended that under the terms and conditions of the grant Congress has not reserved to itself the right of forfeiture, but has provided in each of said grants what the penalty should be for a breach of the condition and that that penalty is not forfeiture, but is only in case of such breach the right to do what may be necessary to insure the speedy completion of the road.

Some eminent lawyers hold to this opinion, and at least one Federal court has taken the same view of the question.

The case of Hughes vs. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company and others, heard and decided by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, in October, 1883, was a suit in equity brought to restrain the company from proceeding further with the erection of a bridge over the Willamette River, and one ground alleged was that the company had lost the right to build the bridge or further construct the road by failure to comply with the condition upon which the grant was made. In the decision the court (Deady, J.) says:

> But the condition imposed upon the defendant by section 8 of the act is even modified by the provisions of section 9, from which it plainly appears that so far from Congress intending that the powers of a corporation should cease or become forfeit in any particular by reason of its failure or inability to keep any of the conditions imposed by said section 8, it expressly reserved to itself the right, in case of such failure for the period of one year, to "do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road."
> In this way Congress undertook to secure the completion of this great national work in any event, and so plainly declare in advance what otherwise might have been left to inference and argument from analogous cases, that it reserved to itself the right to deal with the defendant for any failure to comply with the conditions of the grant, and to excuse or enforce the same as it might under all circumstances deem just to the defendant and best for the public good. Indeed, in view of the magnitude and hazard of the undertaking it was expressly provided that even Congress should not take advantage of a failure to perform any of the conditions for any period less than a year. And even the land set apart by Congress to aid in the construction of the road was not left liable to revert to the public domain or be otherwise disposed of by Congress for the failure of the company to construct or complete the work as required by the act, but, as was said in United States vs. Childers (8 Sawyer, 174), it was devoted to the construction of the road in any event, and it is the duty of Congress to see that it is so applied. (See, also, on this point Southern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Orton, 6 Saw., 178.)
> And this position is fortified by the fact that when Congress intended that the corporate existence of the defendant should be forfeited or affected by its failure to keep a condition imposed upon it, it has expressly said so, as in section 19, where it is provided that unless two millions of the stock is subscribed and 10 per cent. paid thereon within two years from the passage of the act, "it shall be null and void." (18 Federal Reporter, 106, 108.)

I also quote from an opinion of Hon. J. S. Black upon the legal rights of the same company:

> Hon. ROBERT M. MCLANE,
> Chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads,
> House of Representatives:
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> Now, let us look and see if there is anything in this act of incorporation which declares that the land grant may be forfeited, or declared void, or resumed in any event.
>
> In the first place it will be observed that the grant is in verba de præsenti—the title is vested in the company at the moment when the charter is accepted. Unlike some other grants, it does not provide that the title is to be vested as the work goes on.
> It gives it all at once; and when the road is made patents may issue, not to create the title, but to confirm it. If, therefore, the right of the company is now to be taken away, the thing must be done by forfeiting a title already vested, not by refusing to make a title where none existed.
>
> The eighth section declares that the grant shall be held upon conditions, &c., one condition being the completion of the road within a certain time, afterward extended. This I admit would, if there were nothing more, make the estate conditional, and the grantor might exact a forfeiture for condition broken.
>
> But there is something more.
>
> The ninth section prescribes what the penalty shall be for a breach of the condition, and that penalty is not forfeiture. In case of such breach the right is reserved to do what may be necessary to insure the speedy completion of the road. By the terms of the contract this is the only thing that the United States can do.
>
> It excludes the conclusion which might have been drawn from the naked statement of the conditions of the eighth section.
>
> It has been argued (I do not know by whom) that the right to "do any and all acts and things which may be needful to insure a speedy completion of the said road" includes the power to resume the land grant by legislative act. I hope this has never been asserted by any respectable lawyer, for I must say that it is absurd. I am not afraid that any gentleman on this committee will believe it.
>
> The power to deprive a man of his property without process of law is a very different thing from the power to hurry him up in his work. This privilege to speed the making of the road, in case it did not go fast enough, was put in on purpose to negative the right of resumption and furnish another—a specific and exclusive—remedy for the public injury which might be caused by delay or negligence. Besides, the resumption of the land grant is very far from being needful as a means of hastening the work. It is just exactly the contrary. Here is a company moving rapidly along toward the completion of the greatest railroad in the world, and you propose to disable it utterly by taking away its means of going on. Call you that insuring the speedy completion of the work? You might as well cut the hamstrings of a race-horse to insure his fleetness.

> J. S. BLACK.
> YORK, PA., April 19, 1881.

Without expressing an opinion as to the correctness of this view of the law, I do not think that it is a matter to be overlooked or ignored. Some provision ought to be made for judicially determining the question in case of the forfeiture of any grant containing like provisions. Conceding a grant to be a grant upon condition subsequent, for a breach of which the lands may be forfeited and diverted from the object for which the grant was made and restored to the public domain, and made subject to the general land laws of the United States, which, as I have said, in the case of the Northern Pacific, Atlantic and Pacific, and Texas Pacific is denied, let us inquire what the rules of law applicable to such grants are, which, if not governing the action of Congress, limit its power to legislate so as to affect the title of the granted lands and the rights of the grantees.

In case of a grant upon a condition subsequent it is well settled that the grantor alone can take advantage of a failure to perform the condition, and until he asserts such right the legal estate remains vested in the grantee.

This is no new doctrine, and in its application to grants of lands in aid of internal improvements by the Departments and the courts they have only followed the long-settled rule of law upon the subject.

In an opinion dated November 29, 1879 (16 Opinions Attorneys-General, 398), Attorney-General Devens, giving construction to the Minnesota land grant of July 4, 1866, states the law on this subject fully as relates to land grants. I quote the following from that statement:

"While the part of the road to which your inquiries relate was not completed within the time limited by law, no attempt has been made to enforce any forfeiture of the lands granted to the State of Minnesota, or by any means, legislative or other, to revest the title in the United States.

The question whether the State of Minnesota may still claim under the act of Congress lands which have been earned by the construction of the road since the expiration of the period, is determined by the case of Schulenburg vs. Harriman (21 Wall., 44). This was the case of a grant of lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a certain railroad within that State, by an act of June 3, 1856; the language there used in reference to the condition upon which the grant might be defeated by non-completion of the road within ten years was as follows:

"No further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States. The road had not been completed within the time required for its construction, which had not been extended, and Congress had passed no act nor taken any judicial proceeding to enforce any forfeiture of the grant for failure to construct the road within the period prescribed. Upon this state of facts it was held that a present interest was passed by the grant to the State of Wisconsin; that the proviso was in the nature of a condition-subsequent; that the prohibition against further sales if the road were not completed added nothing to the force of the proviso, because a cessation of sales was necessarily implied in the condition that the lands should revert, but that if the condition were not enforced the power to sell continued as before its breach, limited only by the objects of the grant and the manner of sale prescribed by the act; and that as no action had been taken, either by legislation or judicial proceedings, to enfore a forfeiture or revest the title in the United States, that title remained in the State as completely as it existed on the day that the title by location of the railroad acquired precision, and became attached to the adjoining alternate sections. In direct answer to your inquiry upon this point I therefore reply that the Department is authorized by law to issue patents to the State of Minnesota for lands opposite that portion of the road constructed in sections of ten consecutive miles since February 26, 1877, the date at which, according to the fourth section of the act of July 4, 1866, it was provided in the event that the road was not completed that the lands not patented should revert to the United States; and this for the reason above stated, that no act, legislative or judicial, has been taken to revest the title in the United States."

Attorney-General Brewster, in an opinion of date June 13, 1882, in the case (Backbone case) of the application of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company for certain lands claimed under the grant of March 3, 1871, to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, says:

The act of March 3, 1871, passed to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company a present interest in a certain number of alternate sections of public lands per mile within the limits there prescribed. Its language is, "There is hereby granted to said company" the number of alternate sections mentioned, words which import a grant in præsenti and not one in futuro. But the grant thus made is in the nature of a float. It is of sections to be afterward located, their location depending upon the establishment of the line of the road. Until this is definitely fixed the grant does not attach to any specific tracts of land. * * * The proviso in the grant that the company shall complete the whole of its road within five years from the date of the act is a condition-subsequent, the failure to perform which does not ipso facto work a forfeiture of the grant, but only gives rise to a right in the Government to enforce a forfeiture thereof. Yet in order to enforce a forfeiture such right must be asserted by a judicial proceeding authorized by law, or by some legislative action amounting to a resumption of the grant. (Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 44.) Hence until advantage is taken of the non-performance of the condition, under legislative authority, the interest of the grantee in the grant remains unimpaired thereby.

In Van Wyck vs. Knevals (16 Otto, 365) Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The defendant having failed to establish the validity of his own title, attacks the right of the company to the lands covered by the grant, alleging that the company never completed the construction of the entire road for which the grant was made; that after filing its map with the Secretary of the Interior it changed for part of the distance the route of the road, and that it never complied with the conditions of the law of Nebraska for the extension of its road within the limits of that State. We do not deem these objections, when considered with the facts on which they are based, as having any force. There is to them a ready and conclusive answer. Assuming that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, with which the company's road connected, was not, as averred by the complainant, a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, and that therefore the company's proposed road was not entirely completed, the fact remains that the company constructed a portion of the proposed road, and that portion was accepted as completed in the manner required by the act of Congress. Patents for some of the adjoining sections were accordingly issued to the company, and a right to all of them not specially reserved by the condition of the grant vested in it. So far as that portion of the road which was completed and accepted is concerned, the contract of the company was executed, and as to the lands patented, the transaction on the part of the Government was closed and the title of the company perfected. The right of the company to the remainiug odd-numbered sections adjoining the road completed and accepted—not reserved—is equally clear. If the whole road has not been completed, any forfeiture consequent thereon can be asserted only by the grantor (the United States) through judicial proceedings or through the action of Congress. (Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 44.) A third party can not take upon himself to enforce conditions attached to the grant when the Government does not complain of their breach.

In most, if not all, the Congressional grants to States and to corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, the grant is what may be called a divisible grant. By the acts making the grants it is provided that as the construction of the road progresses and sections of a given length, usually from ten to twenty-five miles, are completed, the same shall be inspected and if found to be constructed in accordance with the requirements of the act and the evidence thereof filed, patents for the granted lands conterminous with the completed section shall be issued. In my judgment such a grant is divisible, and the grant as to each section of the road should be so far considered as a separate grant as that when the condition of the grant as to any section of road is performed the title of the grantee to the lands coterminous with such completed sections becomes absolute and not liable to be divested for a failure to perform the condition as to any other section of the road. In other words, it was not the intention of Congress, in case of the failure of a grantee to complete its road, to make the entire grant subject to forfeiture.

It is a well-settled principle of law, that in cases of estates upon condition subsequent time is not of the essence of the contract, and that a forfeiture may be waived by the party who has the right to avail himself of the breach of the condition, and that if entry is not made by the grantor or some act equivalent to entry done by him before the condition is performed, the title of the grantee becomes absolute. In other words, that the performance of the condition by the grantee, though after the time limited in the grant, before the grantor has signified his intention to take advantage of the non-performance of the condition, is as effectual to transform the conditional fee into an absolute title as if the condition had been performed within the time limited in the grant.

It is said that laches may not be imputed to the Government, but the maxim does not apply to a contract between the Government and its citizens. As I have before said, in construing a contract between the Government and individuals, both stand upon an equality before the law. The doctrine that a condition subsequent attached to a grant of the fee to real estate may be performed after the time limited in the grant and before entry by the grantor for a breach is a rule of property, and forms a part of the general law of contracts, and enters into and becomes a part of a contract between the Government and individuals in the same manner that it applies to a contract between individuals. But if this were not so it would hardly be consistent with the honor and dignity of a great government to undertake to apply a different rule to the construction of its contracts with its citizens from that which is applied to the construction of contracts between individuals.

Something has been said as to the rights of mortgagees and grantees of Congressional land grants. As the fee in such grants passes to the grantee there appears to be no reason why the grantee may not sell the granted lands or mortgage them, if in case the grantee is a corporation it has power under its charter to mortgage its property even before the condition is performed and the lands are earned. But it seems evident to me that the vendee or mortgagee of such lands takes no greater estate in them than the original grantee had at the date of the conveyance, namely, a conditional fee only, subject to be forfeited for non-performance of the condition upon which the grant is made.

Several bills for the forfeiture of railroad grants have been reported from the Senate Committee on Public Lands. Among them is the bill under consideration, to forfeit the grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, a bill to forfeit the grant of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, a bill to forfeit the grant of the Oregon Central Railroad Company, and a bill to forfeit the grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

The facts in relation to the bill under consideration have already been fully stated. The company appears to lack the present ability to complete its road, and circumstances have so changed since the grant was made that it is believed the public interests will be better protected by a present forfeiture of the grant than by longer withholding the lands from settlement.

The Texas Pacific bill involves questions of law only, the grant being now claimed by virtue of an assignment by a company which constructed its road before it took the assignment. The committee was unanimously of the opinion that even admitting the right of the grantee to assign the grant, the construction of the road by the assignee company before the assignment was made was not a performance of the condition of the grant, and that the grant should be forfeited. The facts concerning the Oregon Central land grant were as follows:

By an act of Congress entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, there was granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria, and from a suitable point of junction near Forest Grove to the Yam Hill River, near McMinnville, in the State of Oregon, besides the usual right of way, materials for construction, and necessary land for stations, each alternate section of the public lands (not mineral, excepting coal and iron) designated by odd numbers nearest the said road, to the amount of ten such alternate sections per mile upon each side thereof not otherwise disposed of or reserved, or held by valid homestead or pre-emption right at the time of the passage of said act.

Immediately after the passage of said act the said Oregon Central Railroad Company constructed its railroad from Portland to Saint Joseph, about one and a half miles from McMinnville, and about forty-eight miles from Portland. The line as constructed passes in the vicinity of the town of Forest Grove. The road so constructed, and the lands, earned and unearned, have been transferred to and are now owned by the Oregon and California Railroad Company, another Oregon corporation incorporated for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Portland to the southern boundary of the State. The latter company is engaged in the construction of the southern extension of its road to connect with the California and Oregon Railroad, now owned by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and which is being extended northward to meet the Oregon and California Railroad, and thus form railroad connection between the cities of San Francisco, Cal., and Portland, Oreg.

The Oregon and California Railroad Company also owns an extension of the Oregon Central road, built by still another company, the Western Oregon Railroad Company, from Saint Joseph to Corvallis, in Benton County, Oregon, a distance of about fifty miles, and is engaged in constructing an extension of the said road from Corvallis to a junction with the Oregon and California road at Junction City, in Lane County. Preliminary surveys of the line from Forest Grove to Astoria have been made by the Oregon Central and Oregon and California Railroad Companies, but nothing has been done toward the construction of that part of the line. Petitions have been presented to Congress at the present and at previous sessions, praying the forfeiture of the unearned portion of the grant. The petitioners mostly reside at Astoria and along the western end of the proposed line from Forest Grove to Astoria. The Committee on Public Lands early in the session reported favorably a bill to forfeit the unearned portion of this grant; that is, the grant for that portion of the road from Forest Grove to Astoria.

I expect to support that bill. I shall do so not for the reason that the citizens of any locality or localities have petitioned for the forfeiture of the grant, for I think that the citizens of the entire State of Oregon have an interest in the construction of the road, and consequently in the forfeiture of the grant, but I shall support the bill for the reason that the construction of this part of the road, which may properly be termed a branch, has never been commenced, and, so far as I can see, is not likely to be undertaken within a reasonable time by the company. Applying the rule which I think should govern in determining the question of forfeiture to this grant, I think the lands ought not further to be withheld from the market without some satisfactory assurance of the speedy construction of the road.

The report of the committee upon the bill to forfeit the unearned portion of the Northern Pacific land grant is not a unanimous report. A minority of the committee are unwilling that the portion of the grant for what is known as the Cascade branch, which is the projected road from a point where the main line from Lake Superior first reaches the Columbia River across the Cascade Mountains to Puget Sound, and which is a part of the direct line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, should be now forfeited. The bill introduced by me on the 19th of May last, and which I will ask the Secretary to read as a part of my remarks, is the bill which I think should be passed concerning this grant.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill (S. 2229) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the lands heretofore granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company by an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and subsequent acts and joint resolutions of Congress, which are adjacent or appertain to and are conterminous with that part of its main line which extends from Wallula Junction, in Washington Territory, to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, except such of said lands as are adjacent or appertain to and are conterminous with the branch line across the Cascade Mountains, be, and the same are hereby, resumed by the United States and restored to the public domain and made subject to disposition and settlement under the general laws relating to the public lands.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where persons have settled upon any of the lands affected by said grant, and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, or have made improvements thereon with a bona fide intention of purchasing the same of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and such person is not entitled to enter the same under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, such person, upon proving the same to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be entitled to enter not more than three hundred and twenty acres of said lands, including such person's settlement or improvement, at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That in all cases where parties, persons, or corporations, with the permission of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, are in the possession of and have made improvements upon any of the lands hereby resumed and restored, and are not entitled to enter the same under the provisions of this act, such parties, persons, or corporations shall have six months in which to remove any growing crop, and within which time they shall also be entitled to remove all buildings and other movable improvements from said lands.

SEC. 3. That the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall complete its said branch across the Cascade Mountains within five years after the passage of this act, subject to the provisions, duties, and obligations, and with the grants and privileges provided in said act approved July 2, 1864, and the joint resolution relating thereto approved May 31, 1870; and also its main line in the State of Wisconsin to its eastern terminus at or near the mouth of Montreal River, within two years after the passage of this act, subject to and with the provisions, duties, obligations, grants, and privileges aforesaid: Provided, That in case of its failure to complete said branch, or said part of the main line in the State of Wisconsin, within the times herein respectively limited therefor, then and in such case the granted lands appertaining to and conterminous with the then uncompleted parts of said branch and main lines, or either, as the case may be, shall revert to the United States and become part of the public domain, and be subject to disposition and settlement under the general laws relating to the public lands.

SEC. 4. That the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall accept the provisions of this act by a resolution of its board of directors, and file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, within sixty days after the passage of this act, a copy of such resolution authenticated by its corporate seal and the signatures of its president and secretary.

Mr. DOLPH. I need not to this body detail the history of this company. Nor need I state with what energy, since the company recovered from its financial embarrassments caused by the financial crisis of 1873, the construction of its road has been pushed across the continent. The rapidity with which this road was constructed attracted the attention of the whole country, but the interest in the progress of the work in other portions of the Union was slight compared with the interest with which the people of the Pacific Northwest watched its progress. All eyes were turned with expectation toward it. We waited and hoped and at last rejoiced greatly when the last spike was driven and the main line from Lake Superior to Wallula was completed, and Oregon was connected by rail with her sister States.

Wallula is about two hundred and fourteen miles from Portland. The Northern Pacific there connects with the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company's road, which forms a part of the through line from Lake Superior to Portland. From Portland along the south side of the Columbia to a point just below Kalama, which is upon the north or Washington side of the river, and thence to New Tacoma, on Puget Sound, the road is completed. There is also railroad connection between New Tacoma and Seattle, partly by the constructed portion of the Cascade branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad and partly by a railroad constructed by another company. There is also completed and in operation over twenty-five miles of the Cascade branch from New Tacoma eastward, and the construction of that branch is being carried on from the Columbia River westward. It will cost a large amount of money and require considerable time to construct the Cascade branch. If the land grant of the company should now be forfeited I have no doubt that the effect of the forfeiture will be the necessary suspension of the work of construction upon this branch as well as upon the main line.

As to that portion of the grant between Wallula and Portland, applying the rule by which, as I have before stated, I think the question should be determined whether a grant should be forfeited, I think the time has come when the people will be benefited more by an immediate restoration of the granted lands to the public domain and to the operation of the land laws of the United States than by longer holding them from market in order to secure the construction of the road. I am informed that the company during last year did some work along the north side of the Columbia River upon this line, but the work has not been pushed with an energy which indicates an intention and ability of speedily completing that section of the road.

Another company has constructed a road from Portland to Wallula which gives the public the benefit of a through line, and to that extent lessens the public benefits to be derived from the construction of the Northern Pacific road, and by causing the rapid settlement of the country along the line of the road, has increased the inconvenience and injury to the community which will be caused by the further withholding of the lands from market. Many persons have settled upon these railroad lands and are anxious to secure title. As I have before said, if it appeared certain that the road would be built at once, the most satisfactory way to secure the rights of these persons, in my judgment, would be to permit the lands to be earned and the settlers to secure their title from the company.

In considering what should be done for the relief of these persons there is a question worthy of consideration as to the power of Congress to divert the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company from the object of the grant, namely, the construction of the road, which I have already discussed. The bill offered by myself for the forfeiture of this portion of the grant avoids this question, and if it should become a law would at once, no doubt, settle the question of title to all the forfeited lands. It requires the company to assent to the provisions of the bill. The company agreeing for itself, its stockholders, and bondholders, and the United States agreeing for the public, to the forfeiture, the title to the lands and the power of Congress to dispose of them would be finally settled, whatever may be the power of Congress without such assent to declare a forfeiture of the grant.

As a condition upon which an extension of time is granted for the completion of the Cascade branch, I have no doubt that the company would assent to the provisions of a bill for that purpose by which the grant for a portion of its main line from Portland to Wallula would be forfeited. Should the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands become a law the courts would be called upon to determine whether Congress had the power to divert the grant from the objects to which it was made. But in the mean time, and until some final adjudication of the question could be had, the title of the settlers to the lands would be under a cloud, and their value would be greatly impaired.

Looking at this question from my standpoint, unless the act to forfeit this grant should be passed in such a shape as to secure the assent of the company, I should be in favor of providing for the institution of a suit at once by the United States against the company, and all parties claiming under it whose rights are not provided for in the act, to settle finally and within the shortest practicable time the question of title at the expense of the United States, instead of leaving it to be settled at the expense of settlers under the land laws, and providing for an early final decision of the case by giving it precedence on the calendars of all courts, requiring the courts to hear it, and shortening the time for appeal.

The circumstances are quite different in regard to that portion of the grant for the Cascade branch. That part of Washington Territory lying west of the Cascade Mountains is entirely cut off and separated from Eastern Washington by the Cascade Mountains. Without the construction of the Cascade branch, which is in fact the direct line, the only communication between the two portions of the Territory is by way of the Columbia River Valley. The lines of transportation and travel pass through or connect at Portland. Western Washington contains about 30,000 square miles, and is about three and a half times as large as the State of New Hampshire. It contains the great Puget Sound, with its fertile islands, capacious harbors, and its 2,000 miles of shore indented by bays and inlets. It probably now contains the most extensive and valuable forests of timber in the United States.

Underlying these vast forests of fir, pine, and cedar are inexhaustible mines of iron and coal. It has considerable tracts of the finest agricultural land. Its waters teem with fish. In short, it is a valuable portion of the great Northwest, destined to be the future home of millions of people. It was, until the establishment of the civil government for Alaska, the extreme northwestern portion of the organized territority of the United States. The citizens of Washington Territory were among the earliest and most intelligent friends of the Northern Pacific Railroad. They believe that they are entitled to direct railroad communication with the eastern portion of the Territory and with the main line of the Northern Pacific Railroad by way of the Cascade branch.

I believe they are so entitled. I am frank to say that in my opinion the construction of the Cascade branch would not be immediately advantageous to Oregon, or to Portland, its chief city, and I even doubt whether its present construction would be profitable for the company itself. I base my action in this matter upon broader grounds than the interest alone of the people of my State. I believe I should be false to my duty if I permitted myself to be governed by such a consideration, and by my silence, my voice, or my vote helped to place an obstacle in the way of the completion of this branch. I shall be governed in this matter by what I conceive to be the interest of the whole Northwest and of the whole country, and will not without a protest see so large and promising a section of the country cut off from direct communication with the railroad system of the Union at a time when the long-deferred hopes of its people seem about to be realized.

Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Kansas have all received from the Federal Government valuable lands for the purpose of aiding the construction of railroads, and many other States and Territories have received the benefits of valuable grants made to corporations to aid the construction of railroads within their limits. By the liberality of the Government they have been given the facilities of railroads and telegraphs, daily mails and schools; their resources have been developed, their unoccupied lands settled and cultivated, and they have grown strong and independent of further national aid. Are the representatives in this body of these States which have been heretofore so highly favored by the General Government, and whose Senators and Representatives were once suppliants for aid from the Federal Government for railroads for their States, willing to deprive far-off Washington Territory of the aid heretofore granted to secure to her a single direct railroad connection with the railroad system of the country?

It is said that the time is past when it is necessary for the Government to aid in the construction of railroads. That may be true in most of the States and Territories, but it is not true as to Washington Territory. The condition of that Territory to-day is practically the same as was the condition of the Territories of the West when they received liberal Government aid for the construction of their railroads, and which now, by reason of the settlement of their territory and the development of their resources, no longer require assistance. The sparse population of the great Northwest, the difficulties of constructing railroads, the great cost of the transportation of railroad material, the high prices of labor, render the cost of railroad construction very great.

To the Government itself the question as to whether the land grant of the Northern Pacific shall be forfeited and restored to the operation of the land laws, or earned by the railroad company and sold to settlers, is of no great importance. I am not concerned about the sum that would find its way into the public Treasury if the lands were restored to the operation of the land laws. My concern is to know what is for the best interest of the people of Oregon and Washington Territory and of the whole country. If any people deserve liberal treatment at the hands of Congress it is the people who braved the dangers and endured the toils and hardships incident to pioneer life in that country, and who have waited so long for the tide of immigration just now setting toward it.

I am asking of Congress in behalf of Oregon, in view of our great extent of territory, our great and rapidly increasing internal, interstate, and foreign commerce, our great rivers, our extended seacoast, our rapidly increasing population and development, liberal appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. I should feel in a measure estopped from asking such liberal treatment in this regard as our people deserve if the reasons for doing so were not strong enough to prevent me from assisting in depriving the people of Washington Territory of the aid heretofore granted by Congress for the construction of the great highway across the continent which for the last quarter of a century has been the object of their hopes by day and the subject of their dreams by night.

I briefly call attention to another matter which I deem worthy of careful consideration in connection with the proposition to forfeit the land grant for the Cascade branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The Canadian Government has expended large sums of money in the improvement of the St. Lawrence River, and is making a great effort to secure the trade of the Northwest. The Canadian Government has also already expended and is expending fabulous sums in pushing the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad. It seems certain that in a comparatively brief period we may look for the completion of that road, and when that time arrives there is scarcely a doubt but that Great Britain will subsidize a line of steamships between the city of Victoria and Hong-Kong and other ports of China and Japan, and Victoria will become a competitor for the trade of the East, not only with Portland and the cities of Puget Sound, but with San Francisco, which has hitherto enjoyed a monopoly of that trade upon the Pacific coast. In view of this fact it is not alone Western Washington or the people of the Northwest or the stockholders and bondholders of the Northern Pacific that are interested in securing a through line of railroad for the Northern Pacific from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, but such a through line is a national necessity to enable us to fairly compete with Great Britain for the commerce of China and Japan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Winconsin, in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

Mr. BLAIR. Is this the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands there is an amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands on which the question has not yet been taken. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 22, after the word "stations," the Committee on Public Lands propose to insert:

Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the elaborate speeches which have been made upon this subject and the impossibility which I have found to make anything like proper preparation to discuss a question of this magnitude will justify me (as I am sure my course will please the Senate) in making my remarks very brief; and yet, as a member of the committee, having given some thought to the general subject that is involved, not alone in this bill but in the various bills that are before the Senate and the other House of Congress and before the country, proposing the forfeiture of the unearned and in many cases of the earned land grants to railroads which have been constructed by their aid and which it was expected would be constructed by their aid, and not having the good fortune to agree with a majority of the committee but being obliged to vote like the rest of the Senate, I feel that it is proper that I should give some expression to my views.

All the land grants proposed to be forfeited were originally made between the years 1860 and 1870. They all had the same general purpose. From the Mississippi Valley to the Pacific coast our country was comparatively a wilderness, to be sure inhabited here and there. Even large States had been developed and political communities had been established in portions of that great territory, and yet when the actual population of that territory is compared with the teeming millions that it may well support, I am justified in saying that at least in that period that portion of our country westerly of the Mississippi Valley and the Missouri Valley was a wilderness.

For the purpose of opening communication with the Pacific coast it seemed desirable that at least four great natural lines of communication should be established connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific seas. They were chartered; they were all endowed with liberal land grants. They were separated from each other from three to four hundred miles, parallel lines, the Northern Pacific, the Central and Union Pacific, the Atlantic and Pacific, and the Texas and Pacific. Upon the Pacific coast lines connecting these great thoroughfares were also chartered and were endowed with a land grant as in other cases.

In round numbers something like 200,000,000 acres of land were granted to promote these great objects; substantially 50,000,000 acres, a little less I think, to the Northern Pacific; considerably less than that to the Union and Central; some 47,000,000 acres to the Atlantic and Pacific, to which road the bill under consideration has special reference; and a smaller amount to the Texas and Pacific, which appertained only to the Territories lying westerly of the State of Texas. Including the lines extending along the Pacific coast which connected these great proposed thoroughfares, the sum total of the land grant was in round numbers about 200,000,000 acres.

All these enterprises have been entered upon; one of them prosecuted to completion; the Northern Pacific substantially completed to-day; the Atlantic and Pacific more than half completed; the Texas and Pacific, now the Southern Pacific, wholly completed, while the lines connecting the Pacific extremities of these great roads are also practically completed; so that from the Northern Pacific to the Texas and Pacific, now the Southern Pacific, there will be in a very short time a continuous line of communication.

It must be admitted, I think, that substantially the great end sought to be accomplished in the chartering of these lines and in the granting of these immense tracts of land has been accomplished, or if not entirely accomplished it is now so near completion that in the eye of a nation looking to its development and to its destiny we may as the American people say that these roads are finished. Yet they are not complete. Certain almost indispensable things remain to be accomplished, and that is the establishment of the termini on the Pacific coast and some of the connections on the East in order that these great competing transcontinental routes may be established for all time.

I do not know that the Senate makes any proposition to deprive any of these roads of any portion of the grant which has, in the parlance of the time, been earned in any of these cases. That would be such flagrant and abominable injustice that at least the sentiment of this end of the Capitol has rebelled against it. I do not know that any member of the Committee on Public Lands or any member of the Senate entertains the idea of forfeiting the earned portion of any one of these great land grants. By the earned portion I understand that portion of the land grant which lies contiguous and opposite to the completed portions of the road.

In this way there has come to be finally disposed of, vested in these various corporations, their successors, their assigns, their legal representatives (I speak in round mumbers now that the memory may be more likely to carry the figures), about 150,000,000 acres of the 200,000,000 acres granted. Of the remaining portion of these land grants, the 50,000,000 acres, more or less, lying along the uncompleted portions of these roads, no part of which, however, in any of these cases has failed to be surveyed, the line located, and more or less actual and important expenditure made upon them—I say along these remaining uncompleted portions where lie the unearned portions of the grants the lands as a rule are relatively of very little value. I shall not undertake to speak with accuracy. Nobody can speak with accuracy. The data do not exist.

Neither the Senate nor the other branch of Congress nor the committee has been from the beginning to the end of this investigation in the possession of the definite data whereon any jury would be expected to base a verdict, and no judicial decision affecting rights of property to the value of $5 or $5,000,000 would be rendered anywhere in this broad land, I venture to say, before the most incompetent justice of the peace or the highest tribunal in the country, upon such sort of investigation of fact as has been made in any of these cases in either branch of Congress. Basing my statement upon such information as I possess, and such inferences as I think may be fairly made, considering that the uncompleted portions of these various roads pass, many of them, through mountain gorges, that they go through wilderness and desert lands, that very large portions where the land is valuable are already located upon and will be held by private individuals or companies, homesteaders, pre-emptors, individual settlers—taking all these circumstances and others that might, if time would permit, be dwelt upon, I do not believe that to-day there is a really intrinsically valuable portion of the unearned land grants which will be recovered if all these bills of forfeiture are enacted into law, and all of them are successful, investing in the United States what they undertake to do, 10,000,000 acres of good land to-day that will be recovered by the United States by this effort to forfeit land grants amounting to 200,000,000 acres.

We see in the newspapers and hear something in the discussions in both branches of Congress of the practical result that will come from this great movement to destroy vested rights and to humbug the American people. The proposition that they are to recover immense portions of the public domain in my belief will simmer down to a recovery of not exceeding one-twentieth part of the land originally granted, and which the people are led generally in the discussions to expect that they will recover. So the real, practical, sensible proposition before us in the aggregation of these bills (I am not speaking now of the single one that is before the Senate) is to make an effort by this public demonstration or declaration of forfeiture of all these grants to recover to the United States not exceeding 10,000,000 acres of really valuable lands.

It is very true we might recover perhaps mountain tops, we might recover desert lands, lands that the companies themselves would be glad to part with for 5 cents an acre in cash, or 10, 15, 20, or 25 cents an acre in cash, and a much larger amount, nominally an amount in my belief not exceeding forty or fifty million acres and an actual amount not exceeding 10,000,000 acres of really valuable, homesteadable, if I may use the expression, land fit for occupation and for purposes of getting a livelihood on 160 acres. Most of this land may be valuable in the way of pasturage, and it may be important to individuals in this country that the lands should be forfeited in order that vast projects in the direction of the accumulation of great ranches and the development of pasturage for cattle with a view to the accumulation of fortunes in that way may be facilitated; but I am talking about the actual value of what we are undertaking to do to the ordinary American citizen, the homesteader, the man who understands that from the proceeding which we are initiating here in these concluding moments of the session he is to have the opportunity, and his children after him, to establish a homestead on 160 acres as a consequence of our action to-day.

Whether this is a project which it is worth while to undertake without due consideration, without ample investigation, without the settlement of all questions of fact in a substantially judicial procedure, although the action itself might be taken by Congress, is a very serious question. I think it is understood from decisions of the courts and the general position of legal minds in this country that lands may be forfeited in either of two ways—by a judicial procedure or by an act of Congress. Whether an act of Congress is equivalent to forfeiture or not seems to be to some extent a controverted question. I think the best authority is to the effect that a declaration of forfeiture is simply equivalent to what is known in the common law as "office found." It is a declaration of an intention to recover the possession of whatever lands the United States may be entitled to in law. It is not an actual recovery. It certainly is no recovery as against any individual or corporation who has a vested right. It is simply a declaration of an intention to get what belongs to the United States, to take possession of it and dispose of it as its own property. That it is not an actual recovery I think will be universally conceded as against an individual who had an already vested right, and although the declaration may be made, wherever there is a controversy, or an opportunity for controversy, the courts are still open, or if there is no legal procedure available it is the duty of Congress to make courts and to open courts which may adjudicate that controversy.

But, Mr. President, in whichever way this is done, the thing to be done is substantially the same. It is necessary to ascertain the fact. It must be conceded that the fact should be ascertained upon no less reliable testimony when we are to legislate upon that fact than should be required for its establishment when that same fact is to be made the basis of legal decision. If that is a sound position—and assuming that it is on the whole the duty of Congress to exercise the power of forfeiture whatever it may be—I say, in the first place, there has been by Congress no such procedure to ascertain the facts in this case or in any of these cases as would be required by the universal sense of justice on the part of mankind in the most trivial matter concerning property or any human right.

The Committee on Public Lands of this body which has reported all these bills has had no sources of information excepting the public records of the country and the statements of counsel for the interested corporations. In not a single instance do the public records of the country shed the necessary light as a basis of action. They are the charters; they are the records of the survey and location of the various routes. They show something of the completion of these roads so far as they have been completed; the acceptance of certain portions of the projected lines, and the conveyance of the lands conterminous therewith; but so far as the uncompleted portions of the lines are concerned along which lie the lands which it is proposed to forfeit, there has been nothing like that sort of investigation as a basis of action on the part of the committee of the Senate, and in so far as I know of any committee, that would be required in the most ordinary judicial procedure. We have the statement of counsel representing these corporations, and that is all that we have on the other side.

I believe that before we undertake to enact laws which will result unquestionably in a vast mass of litigation, in the violation of a great deal of private right, or at all events in inciting a vast amount of controversy that will have to be adjudicated somewhere, we should first for ourselves ascertain the facts and in such a way that the evidence would be satisfactory in any judicial proceeding. We certainly can not justify ourselves in dealing with these great questions, nor in dealing with minor questions that concern the rights of property and the great public questions which are involved in the completion of these roads unless we have the facts, and the facts, I assert, we have not.

Therefore, I say it is my belief that the proposition to forfeit, as is proposed in these various bills, any portion of these land grants is at the present time immature; and the first thing that should be done by Congress, if it proposes to pass these bills, is to refer them to appropriate committees with instructions to investigate and report the facts to the Senate, and thereupon legislation may be safely based. I am opposed to the enactment of any one of these land-grant-forfeiture bills at the present time. I believe they are radically wrong. I believe that they are simply the entering wedge to disturbance and distress; that they are against sound public policy; that the land-grant-forfeiture bills which it is proposed now to enact are simply humbugs, and are, if not designed to be, substantially misleading the American people.

Now, sir, let us look a little more closely to the condition of these various roads. Take the Northern Pacific for instance. It is a route substantially of 2,500 miles in length. It has its eastern terminus, not yet constructed, to be sure, the one that it is proposed finally to rely upon. I think it has located at Ashland, on Lake Superior a little north of Duluth, and a short distance remains to be constructed to establish the eastern terminus of that great road. It has been built westerly, it has passed through the Territories, it has crossed the Rocky Mountains, it has come to Snake River, in has arrived within two hundred miles of Puget Sound by the Cascade branch; it has arrived within two hundred and fifteen miles of Portland city, the other terminus on the Pacific Ocean of this great route.

By the universal concession in the Senate, the whole length of the Northern Pacific is completed, with the exception of the two prongs which open upon the Pacific coast and which are its termini in that direction. With the exception of less than five hundred miles lying directly on the Pacific, the road is completed; but those five hundred miles are not completed. To be sure, the Northern Pacific has an outlet to Portland over a rival line which it has hired or leased or obtained the use of for a limited period of time. It does not own that corporation; it does not own that road.

Suppose, now, that the Cascade branch is never constructed; suppose that the main line down the Columbia River is never constructed, who owns the Northern Pacific Railroad? Do the people of the United States? Has the Government control over the Northern Pacific according to the conditions of the charter? Of what avail is it as a great transcontinental road if we are to abandon—and the object of the proposed forfeiture is the abandonment practically of what is called the Cascade branch that goes to Puget Sound and opens to us the prospect of control, by way of the Northern Pacific, of the great Asiatic trade of the future? That is to be removed from the possibility of construction. At all events if built hereafter there is no reason to suppose that it will remain in the ownership of the Northern Pacific Company. The forfeiture of the land grant down the Columbia River is instigated in my belief by parties, not homesteaders, not settlers, but great corporations who know that if they own the western terminus of this road they own the road the whole length of it. Whoever owns the two ends owns the road. I say in the interest of another great corporation it is proposed to forfeit the lands along the Columbia, the main line of the Northern Pacific, and thus to disappoint the people of the United States in regard to the purpose which was designed to be obtained by the construction of the great northern route.

To the people of Oregon, to the local interests of Oregon, it may be very well that her Senators, one or both of them, should appear on this floor and say "forfeit both these branches" as one of them does say, and the other "forfeit one of them; forfeit the land along the main branch leading to Portland, but save the Cascade branch," which can not be constructed without great expense and requiring some three or four years' time to do it. I say it may be very well for local interests, for corporate interests (for I believe those are the interests concerned here) to say forfeit the land grant along these two branches which open upon the Pacific and which practically control the Northern Pacific transcontinental line, but for the people of the United States who have furnished the money that has built this great road, for the capitalists, for the small farmers, for the depositors in savings' banks, for the widows and children and those who are the controllers of trust funds in my portion of the country to sympathize with a movement of this kind is not in the nature of things. Nor do I believe it to be otherwise than utterly subversive of the great ends for which the Northern Pacific Railroad was originally incorporated.

It is matter of common knowledge that the British Government is constructing a transcontinental Canadian railroad with its outlet practically upon Puget Sound, substantially and practically the same terminus as our own line with reference to the great commerce in the future of the Asiatic continent and of our own possessions in that direction.

As I said before, while it may be well enough for large pecuniary interests on the Pacific coast to come here and howl about this little bit of a land grant that is essential to the completion of the four or five hundred miles that remain uncompleted upon the Pacific coast, it is utterly subversive of the great ends for which the United States Government and the people of the United States first chartered this great line and devoted 50,000,000 acres of land to it. To say to the common American people, those in pursuit of homesteads, that a measure of this kind is in their interest is almost an infamous lie.

I am very well aware that the position which I take upon this matter is not the popular position, and I had much rather take the opposite. I should very much prefer to vote for all these bills. I understand how it is easier to drift with the current, but I appeal from the now to the hereafter, and I assert here in my place in the Senate that these bills, in my belief, are utterly subversive of sound public policy and destructive of private personal rights.

Now take the Atlantic and Pacific, which is the bill pending before us. That is a line connecting that portion of our country centering at Saint Louis and further south with the Pacific coast, or was designed so to do, by a line practically along the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude.

I will not here—because the story has already been recited—undertake to speak of the efforts, of the struggles in good faith, and of the things accomplished already by this greatly crippled corporation. It has by itself or by its assigns actually constructed, if I am not mistaken, about 1,400 miles of road. In that I include the four hundred miles that have been constructed through the State of Missouri westerly and into the Indian Territory, including along with the rest that which was acquired by purchase. More recently and within the last four years, about 1,000 miles have been completed in what is practically the central portion of the Atlantic and Pacific line, commencing substantially in the center of the line as originally chartered and building both ways about five hundred miles. There you have the link which cost some $16,000,000, which was constructed, as I said, between 1880 and the present time and so as to form a junction with the Southern Pacific, which extends from San Francisco southerly to Fort Yuma and then easterly to New Orleans.

This junction has been accomplished with the Southern Pacific, a rival ownership, and this 1,000 miles of road is to-day a feeder of the Southern Pacific on the one hand and of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé route, another rival ownership, on the other hand. Before the purpose for which this road was chartered can be accomplished it must have an outlet upon the Pacific, and there is a point, the name of which has at this moment escaped me, almost directly westerly of the point of junction with the Southern Pacific, which is the outlet upon the Pacific coast originally contemplated and still contemplated as one of its outlets, and then farther off its line is to extend from that point northwardly along the coast to San Francisco.

If the land grant is forfeited along this uncompleted line on the westerly end of this railroad, of course it is with the expectation that it will never be built, and it is not likely to be, at least for a great many years. That land grant, as such information as we get has shown, is not of much value. A great portion of it, I think, was described properly by the Senator who opened the debate, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], as wilderness, waste land, sand, utterly useless, until by some expensive system of irrigation it shall be made valuable in the future, if it can be in fact made valuable at all. Other portions of it may be cultivable land; but the great mass of that land grant which is of value, I believe, is in what has been for a long time a populated country, and is already taken up, and is not available to the corporation. So that the land grant, which, if this bill passes, we shall recover west of the junction of the Atlantic and Pacific with the Southwestern Pacific, is very trifling in extent and still more trifling in value.

It may be said that if it is of so trifling value it is of very little consequence even to the corporation whether it is forfeited or not; but omitting all reference to the matter of legal rights already vested in those who have contributed their money for the construction of those portions of the road already built, and who had taken security for their bonds along this same land grant, we all know that if you deprive this road of the credit, such as it is, based upon the possession of these lands, the fact will be taken advantage of by the road itself as an excuse for failing to carry out its stipulations with the Government, and it would be right that it should do so. On the other hand, if these comparatively unimportant lands, not valuable lands, are allowed to remain as they are in the possession of the corporation, and it could understand that it was not to be interfered with for a reasonable length of time, there is very little doubt that the necessity of finding an outlet upon the Pacific coast in order that the remaining portions of their expenditures invested in the constructed railroad should be of value to them would induce them, if left undisturbed, very soon to construct the remaining portions of their road, and thus give to us a terminus on the thirty-fifth line of latitude on the Pacific coast, and also have the extension northerly and another terminus of the same road in San Francisco.

With reference to the other end of the Atlantic and Pacific connecting the portion constructed in the Territories with that already built westerly to Vinita, in the Indian Territory, and now in progress of construction still farther west, if we forfeit this land grant it is not likely to be built, and thus at both ends the original idea of a transcontinental line along the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude is utterly subverted and destroyed. The representatives, the officers of this company, and its attorneys came before the committee. They stated to the committee the efforts which they had put forth, the amounts of money which they had raised, and the amount of road which they had constructed, and the great portion of it in a very recent period of time, and they stated what they had done as an omen, as a pledge of the good faith with which they would proceed, if permitted to do so, to the completion of their great enterprise. I believe that if this road is not interfered with, the capital already invested will be made a profitable investment by the completion of both extremities of this transcontinental line. I believe if we do not pass this bill but pass other legislation such as I shall presently suggest to the Senate, we shall not only protect these private interests, but we shall very soon see the accomplishment of the great enterprise itself and the promotion of the interests of the American people in a very large degree.

With reference to the other grants which extend northerly and southerly which are designed to connect the Northern Pacific with San Francisco, I have but little to say. Two such lines are nearly completed. The Oregon and California and the California and Oregon roads, the one running southerly and the other northerly, extend toward each other, and when they meet are designed to be practically the same line of road, though owned by different corporations. With reference to these corporations, the land grant is of very slight importance. It probably is not worth 10 cents an acre on the average.

The roads are nearly completed. If I recollect aright, the officers testified that if they were left undisturbed, the road extending southerly from Portland in the direction of the California line, that is, the Oregon and California road, would be completed by next January, and they have come now to the most expensive portion of their whole road, a very expensive piece of tunneling to be done, so that the road itself, longitudinally speaking, is already almost completed, but very few miles remaining, the expenditure remaining being upon this exceedingly difficult pass or tunnel of which I speak.

The other road pushing northwardly is likely to be completed, if I remember the statement of those representing the company, within one year. The great mass of the land grant is already vested; the land to be recovered is exceedingly trifling, and the whole proceeding in my deliberate judgment, speaking with all respect to the views of others, is a mere farce, unsatisfactory to the people if it is done, no reward from it, nothing realized, and so far as anything is done we simply enter upon a course which subjects the people of the United States to a great mass of litigation in the future—simply that and nothing more.

Mr. President, with these general, emphatic views in regard to the policy of this sort of legislation at the present time and until we have ascertained particularly the facts in all these cases, and then with very strong views that it would be entirely unwise to proceed to forfeit these lands, even if the facts alleged to be true were found to be so, I have thought it worth while to prepare an amendment in the nature of a substitute to this bill, which I should be very glad to see adopted instead of the bill itself. I will read it; but before proceeding to do so I wish to say that while these roads, in my belief, should have further time, those that are proceeding and have been proceeding in good faith to the completion of their ways to finish them, I do recognize the justice of the complaint that in many instances settlers, homesteaders, private individuals are exceedingly embarrassed in the establishment of homes by reason of the delays that have in most cases, unavoidably I think, occurred in the construction of the roads.

I think in any action that we take, while we give these roads a fair opportunity to construct their lines, particularly on account of the fact that the remaining portion of them involves the termini to the lines, if we give any further remedial legislation in the substantial nature of amendments to their charters, we have a right to impose such conditions as will protect the settlers and the common people of the country who desire to obtain possession of the lands. There is no reason, it seems to me, why we may not in such legislation, while giving the roads the substantial benefit to be derived from the sale of their lands, at the same time take back into the possession of the United States, the land authorities of the country, the practical management of this domain. If we could do that and secure the completion of the roads, and while we protected vested rights on the one hand gave on the other full opportunity to those in the pursuit of homes to obtain unencumbered, unquestioned, uncontroverted titles to the unearned lands, we should meet all the requirements of the public at large, at the same time that we do no injustice to those corporations.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before the Senator reaches the other branch of the case, will he allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think he was characterizing the desire to forfeit unearned lands as being in the nature of humbug or something of that kind. I do not object to the language. I merely wish to know whether the Senator would mean to apply those criticisms to the resolutions of the State of New Hampshire that were approved on the 7th day of September, 1883, and submitted by himself in this body on the 5th day of December last? Would he desire it to be understood that his remarks apply to the resolutions adopted by the State of New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has several times called my attention to those resolutions of the State of New Hampshire in our little controversies in our committee and elsewhere on this subject, and I have no disposition that in this public manner he shall undertake to fasten upon me the imputation of an affront to the Legislature that did me the honor at an earlier period to give me a seat upon this floor. I say to the Senator that he entirely misrepresents what I said to the Senate. I did not stigmatize the desire to forfeit these lands as a humbug. I made no intimation of that description; and the Senator would do well before he arraigns me in this manner to note what I did say. I said that I looked upon the impression that was given to the public as to the results of these proceedings for forfeiture as a humbug to the American people, and I assert it again, and I have endeavored to show to the Senate why I consider it a humbug. Unless I am misinformed, I aver that it is my deliberate belief that the representation made by many that ought to be responsible sources of information to the American people that there are about 200,000,000 acres of land to be recovered by these proceeedings and returned to the public domain and opened for settlement to homesteaders and the people at large is a humbug to the extent of at least nineteen-twentieths of the mathematical assertion.

If every one of these bills is successful, if everything is forfeited that it is undertaken to forfeit by any bill before the Senate, for all of them combined cover nothing but unearned lands, not more than 50,000,000 acres in the aggregate will be covered, and those 50,000,000 acres comprise the mountain tops and desert lands, so that not more than 10,000,000 acres in my belief are of any substantial value. I say that in view of these facts, and I believe that they are facts, this assurance to the American people that we are recovering for the homesteaders of the country 200,000,000 acres of land is an arrant and disgraceful humbug.

Now a word in reference to the resolutions of the Legislature of my State. I am an American citizen. I do not live in Nebraska or in New Hampshire alone; I live in America, and I will read to my friend a more recent utterance of the national organization of the Republican party, in which they proceed to say:

> We demand of Congress the speedy forfeiture of all land grants which have lapsed by reason of non-compliance with acts of incorporation in all cases where there has been no attempt in good faith to perform the conditions of such grants.

I ask the Senator if in a single instance wherein these bills have been reported to the Senate, which he has sustained, he can say that any one of these corporations has made no attempt in good faith to construct its road? The Northern Pacific has built 2,000 miles of road under the most enormous difficulties, and the Senator now proposes to abolish the termini on the Pacific coast which alone make it of consequence to the American people whether it is completed or not. The Oregon and California and the California and Oregon roads are nearly completed under enormous difficulties. And has there been no attempt on their part in good faith, as well as on the part of the Northern Pacific, to complete their roads? The Atlantic and Pacific have constructed 1,400 miles of road under difficulties for the existence of which the United States is very largely responsible, as the Senator well knows and as the records of the country show.

Will the Senator undertake to say that with only four or five hundred miles remaining to be constructed on the Pacific coast, and those the miles that are essential to make the road valuable to the public at large, he does his duty to his own people or the American people, or shows allegiance to the Legislature of his own State, or true allegiance to the great party of which he is so high and worthy a representative, by forfeiting those lands which are essential to the completion of those four or five hundred miles on the Pacific coast? Does he undertake to say that there has been no attempt in good faith on the part of the Atlantic and Pacific Company to complete its line of road?

Take the Southern Pacific. We know it was completed within the time, and that the questions involved in reference to that grant are not those which are involved with reference to the others, because the facts were already settled, the road is completed, the grant is assigned, the assignment is valid as they believe. It is a question of law who owns it, and it is a question that the courts must decide. No legislation we can have will have effect upon it.

Now, I ask the Senator, in return for his question to me, if he thinks it is quite the thing, if it is quite the part of a gentleman to rise and interrogate me as though I had accused my own Legislature of an utterance in the nature of a humbug? My State does not want to forfeit lands properly vested and which belong to corporations that have been chartered and that are endeavoring to construct their roads. My Legislature is not made up of the kind of men who desire to perpetrate highway robbery simply because they have the power to do it. They would like perhaps to take the unearned lands; they would be glad where the corporations have abandoned the effort to build their roads to get back the lands, and so would I; so I hope would the Senator from Nebraska. I am very sorry to be obliged to believe, if I draw my inferences from his conduct rather than from what I know of his motives and his heart, that he himself would, if he could, be willing to take some of the land that did not belong to him, speaking of him in his representative capacity.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator has in a measure answered the question. I very much regret that he should have felt that it was meant in an offensive sense.

Mr. BLAIR. I presume the Senator had an idea that I would take it in an offensive sense.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not know why the Senator should undertake to take it in an offensive sense whether I desired him to do so or not. I can not understand that.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I thought I understood the Senator, and his answer to the question shows that I did. I stated that he spoke of certain operations in regard to the matter of forfeited land grants as being humbug, and the Senator concedes that he did use that language.

Mr. BLAIR. No; I concede nothing about my language. If I am to be quoted and quoted as assenting, I prefer to appeal to the record rather than the Senator's statement.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I appeal to the record, too; but the Senator distinctly repeated what he had characterized as being a humbug in this matter as the pretext that there were millions of acres more than there were, that the land was more valuable than it really was, that that part of it was a humbug; and then I merely propounded the question and supposed the Senator would consider that as rather a favor than otherwise, because——

Mr. BLAIR. So I did.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Because the question might be propounded to him hereafter where he could not meet it so readily in his speech.

Mr. BLAIR. Probably; but I am accustomed to take care of my own hereafters. If I need assistance in Nebraska I know I can call on the honorable Senator from Nebraska, and I shall get it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not at all; I supposed it was a matter of friendly courtesy.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly; I take it that way; but it was quite unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from New Hampshire yielded to the Senator from Nebraska; therefore the Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I yielded for a question. I did not yield for a catechism; I did not propose to do that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; I do not propose to come in any collision with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator propounded a question to me also in his concluding remarks, which I, of course, presume he intended I should answer right here. Certainly the Senator will not refuse me the privilege to deny that there was any idea to intrude anything on his time which might be considered at all offensive; but in the innocency of my nature I asked whether that portion of his remarks was designed to apply to the resolutions of the State of New Hampshire upon the matter of forfeited land grants, and the Senator in answer to that reads a resolution of the Republican national convention at Chicago. I would only refer him to some very pertinent remarks made by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BLAIR. I would prefer, if the Senator is to enter upon a lengthy discussion, that he should do so when I have completed what little I have to say. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall read the resolutions of the State of New Hampshire if he chooses, and I will incorporate them in my speech. The Legislature of New Hampshire ordinarily produces something worthy of the attention of any body.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is what I supposed and that is the reason my attention was called to it. I knew it was worthy of notice when it came from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. But when the Senator has read it, I desire to give him notice I propose to claim the floor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I supposed the Senator did not want anything more. I will read the New Hampshire resolutions:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Office of Secretary of State, Concord.

Joint resolution against land subsidies to railroads.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, That whereas the Government of the United States has given to the railroads 178,952,688 acres of land, an area equal to thirty times the State of New Hampshire, and comprising the best lands of our national domain, the land grants in many cases being over 25,000 acres to every mile of railroad constructed; and

Whereas if such grants were ever proper that necessity has passed away, and many of the roads recently built are uncalled for, far in advance of any public need, and projected and constructed mainly to gain possession of immense tracts of land to enrich a few men, who monopolize the best sections, holding them for a rise, or to exact unreasonable prices from settlers, against the public welfare; and

Whereas the public lands are the property of the whole people, held in trust for the benefit of the whole people, and when sold they should be sold in such quantities and on such terms as to encourage settlement and improvement, and not be given to large corporations nor in any other way squandered: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to oppose any further land subsidies to railroads except the right of way, and any land grants for any purpose except for objects of national importance; and, especially, to oppose any renewal of forfeited land grants.

Resolved further, That his excellency the governor be requested to send copies of this joint resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives, and to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, at the opening of the next session of our national Congress.

Approved September 7, 1883.

Now, if the Senator desires to resume the floor, I presume I must yield.

Mr. BLAIR. "Any renewal of forfeited land grants" is what the New Hampshire Legislature objects to, and that is entirely consistent with everything I have said. I have not advocated the renewal of forfeited land grants at all. When a corporation comes here asking for a renewal of a forfeited grant it will be time enough to discuss that question. The Senator knows, I suppose, that the question when a land grant is forfeited is a question of law depending upon the facts that may be established in each particular case. It is getting to be conceded now, what was not earlier in the session, that it is impracticable and wrong to take from a corporation that portion of its land grant lying along the completed part of its road. A different doctrine was once held. That much has been conceded. That is not forfeited, and is not forfeited because it is earned, as they say.

Now, suppose that the same corporation has partially constructed the remainder of its road, that it has expended large sums of money in so doing, that it has surveyed the entire length of its line, that it has done all these things in the nature of preparation essential to the construction of its line, and expended very considerable amounts of money on the whole length of the remainder of that line—you will say is a partially earned land grant perhaps, because that same process continued a little longer and the road is completed and then the whole of the grant would be earned. But in every one of these cases the time originally limited for the completion of the road has expired. What do the courts say as to that? I know the Senator does not believe in the courts so much where their decisions touch land grants, notwithstanding the courts make the law that all of us are bound by.

I do not know why the decision of an honest court is not entitled to obedience, at all events, if not to respect, as much in one case as in another. The courts have settled that where the time limited for the construction of a road has expired so that the right to make the declaration of forfeiture has accrued or to undertake the forfeiture itself and the recovery of the land through a judicial proceeding, if, nevertheless, the United States stands by and sees that corporation go on and expend its money in the further prosecution of its enterprise, it thereby gives to the corporation a license to continue its work, and it is under the operation of such a license that the greater proportion of the Northern Pacific Railroad has been constructed and the lands vested and transferred to the corporation. It is in consequence of a like license and the acquiescence of the Government in the exercise of its rights and the expenditure of its money by the corporation, that 1,400 miles of the Atlantic and Pacific have been constructed.

Here I raise a question to which I ask the consideration not alone of the Senator from Nebraska, but of the Senate. If the country gives this corporation a license to proceed with its enterprise after the Government have the right to exercise a forfeiture legislatively or judicially, if they extend its time at all, I ask for what period do they extend it? Originally the period was fixed in the statute, a reasonable period for the construction of the road as it was then supposed. It failed to be a period within which the road was constructed. At all events the time is extended by the license, and for how long is it extended? How long in law, how long in reason is it extended? There can be but one answer to a question like that. It is extended to such time as gives reasonable opportunity to the corporation to complete the road, not to build an additional section of fifty miles or one hundred miles or five hundred miles; but if the company subsequent to that limitation fixed proceeds to expend its money and undertakes to complete its entire enterprise, and the country lies quietly, acquiescingly, by and sees the expenditure going on, that license I say is a license for such reasonable time as is necessary to complete the whole enterprise; and the land grant of the Northern Pacific can not in law be forfeited, certainly it can not be forfeited in equity or in justice, until the Northern Pacific has had the utmost limit fixed by law for the completion of its road, the Government having allowed it to go on beyond that time, until the Northern Pacific has had a reasonable time to complete its road to Puget Sound and to Portland.

You may say that is not law; it is equity, and in my judgment it is law and equity both. And just so in regard to these other roads. I speak only of this as an illustration, for the principle is the same and should be applied to all of them. I assert that there is no legal right and still less a moral right on the part of the United States to exercise this act of forfeiture in a single instance that has been brought to the attention of the committee or the Senate, excepting in the case of one unimportant road where there had been an actual and perpetual abandonment of the enterprise. I say the legal status is such that you can not properly apply the term "unearned land" to a single portion of the line on the Northern Pacific or on the Atlantic and Pacific or on the Oregon and California or on the California and Oregon road, and as to the Southern Pacific whatever questions may arise in the case of that corporation are simply questions of law because all the facts are already in the past.

And now, Mr. President, I wish to proceed with the few further remarks I was about to offer when I was interrupted. I should be glad to see adopted instead of this bill and instead of all these bills the measure I hold in my hand; or if this is not as perfect in the matter of legal expression as it ought to be I should be glad to see it adopted with such modifications as the legal acumen of the Senate may suggest:

That whenever any portion of the public lands shall have been granted to any State, or to any corporation, its successors or assigns, not including the right of way and land for stations, to aid in the construction of a railroad westerly of the Mississippi River, and there has been failure to perform such conditions on the part of the grantee, its successors or assigns, and the cause of forfeiture, if such there be, has not been enforced by the United States, and since such failure to perform and the accruing of such cause of forfeiture there shall have been any further prosecution of the work of building such railroad in good faith, and with intent of completing the same on the part of such State or corporation, its successors or assigns, and such intention and purpose still exist, there shall be such further extension of time as may be necessary, not exceeding four years from and after the passage of this act, for the construction and completion of the road, and for the performance of the conditions contained in the acts granting such lands, which may be done either by the grantees, their successors or assigns, or such parties in interest, whether creditors or otherwise, as shall find the completion of the road necessary for the protection of capital invested in the construction of such railroad, and who therefore in equity and good conscience should be allowed to perform such conditions and complete such road or roads.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be construed strictly as a notification to every such State and corporation, its successors or assigns, and to all persons and parties whatsoever, that the United States will declare, and hereby does declare, all lands granted hitherto and embraced in the first section, and all rights and franchises therein, which shall not, at the end of the extension of time provided in the first section, be fully earned in accordance with the provisions of the grant, absolutely forfeited, and to be forfeited to the United States, saving only such vested rights as can not be forfeited according to law.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed as permitting the withdrawal or withholding of any portion of the granted lands—

And I call attention to this section particularly, as it is the section that I should be glad to see adopted to practically vest the control of the lands along the uncompleted portions of these roads in the United States, saving only the consideration to the companies provided they complete the road:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as permitting the withdrawal or withholding of any portion of the granted lands not earned before the passage of this act from occupation or settlement or acquirement by actual settlers in good faith under the public-land laws, or to enlarge or change in any way the rights of the grantees, their successors or assigns, so as to prevent the acquirement of such lands by actual settlers under the land laws in the same way that would be permitted in consequence of the expiration of the limitation of time or breach of other condition in the original grants of such lands, and the acts amendatory thereof; but all such lands not already earned shall be open to occupation and settlement and acquirement upon the terms and conditions which would exist if this act had not been passed; the consideration paid for such granted lands as may be sold and disposed of after the passage of this act being paid by the United States to the grantee, its successors or assigns, so long as the conditions imposed by law upon such grantee, its successors or assigns, shall be complied with, and not afterward.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act patents for such lands shall issue directly from the United States to the settler thereon who shall be entitled to the same.

Legislation of that kind, it seems to me, would protect the public, and the individual, and the corporation—all those interested in the construction of the road. It is a very serious matter to this particular corporation to pass this bill. Within the last two or three years some $16,000,000 have been invested in the construction of the 1,000 miles in the central portion of the line. I am informed by a party who cannot be mistaken that that portion of the road, owing to the want of its eastern and its Pacific connections, is a dead loss. It is run at a loss of one or more hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, and is likely to be for the future. The investment is drawn very largely from my portion of the country; and the question is whether this infinitesimal amount of the land grant shall be forfeited, and this great enterprise be crippled, dwarfed, defeated, and this amount of property drawn from capitalists and from all classes of people, those hoarding their little savings as well as those having larger amounts, is to be entirely lost. That is the question with which the Senate is dealing today, and I have felt constrained to give utterance to these views and to insist upon it that the Senate is dealing with a great subject involving many, many millions of dollars, and the failure of great enterprises having very much to do with the questions of transportation which so largely concern our present and our future. I trust that some heed may be given to these considerations, that at least we pause before we enact this bill without important modifications.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, section 1, after the word "stations," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire to detain the Senate. I hope we shall be able now to vote upon the several amendments without any further debate. There are many things that might be said, but the main facts of the case are too plain to be a matter of dispute, and I think the Senate is fully advised in the premises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the question be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 17, after the word "forfeited," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "grant," in line 26, and to insert——

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Alabama, as I understand, desires simply to attach his amendment at the proper place to the amendment of the committee which has just been adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. It will come in more properly and regularly after the proviso. I move to strike out all after the word "forfeited," in line 17, down to and including the word "stations," in line 24. That will bring the proviso which has just been adopted at the end of the section; and then the additional sections will follow the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out after the word "forfeited," in line 17, all of section 1 down to and including the word "stations," in line 24, and after the proviso at the end of section 1 to insert the following new sections:

SEC. 2. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited lands that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any laws of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest therein.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable.

SEC. 4. Any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands or any part thereof which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath, and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim is necessary to do complete justice in such cause the court shall direct that such further proceedings be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.

SEC. 5. The court shall, if it see fit, tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the cost of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree therein to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court for appeals in equity cases. And the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket so that the same shall be speedily determined. But no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas who has the bill in charge whether the provision for restoring this land immediately to the public domain and making it open to settlement and entry at once does not leave settlers who may thus purchase of the Government just in that unsettled condition as to their titles in which the people on the Des Moines River grant and the Ontonagon people and others are?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think it does at all. My own belief is that the railroad company have no right that is not forfeitable absolutely at the pleasure of the legislative authority of the Government. I think it would be much wiser to declare this forfeiture now and make it final than to submit the matter to the slow process of adjudication in the courts with all the uncertainty which would undoubtedly ensue. I am perfectly certain that no portion of the railroad in the State of California, at least, will be built under this land grant. If it should be, the question would at once arise as to whether under the charter it could be built on the line from which the lands are now withdrawn. I am as clear as I ever was of anything in my life that the railroad can not be built upon the line after the withdrawal is made. All these questions will remain to be determined hereafter, and I think the process of settling them in the courts will only add to the difficulties rather than eliminate them.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe the committee have good reason why we should declare and why we may declare effectively a forfeiture of this land grant. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Kansas in saying that the case is one where the declaration of the forfeiture ought to be made; it is one where probably a declaration will be efficient; but it can not be denied that there are legal difficulties connected with the title to the lands which we thus seek to restore to the public domain. The question in my mind is this: Pending those legal difficulties, before they are settled and before the title has been established in the United States by some judgment that will bind the railroad company and bind the mortgagees, is it wise for us to throw these lands open to settlement and make them part of the public domain, and set the Commissioner of the General Land Office to work selling them? It seems to me that if we do that we shall have in many of these cases for years clouds over the titles of the settlers to whom the United States has conveyed the property, so serious as to affect the value of the property and their ability to realize upon the sale of it, and perhaps ultimately throw the burden of litigation upon the people who buy of the United States as against the railroad company instead of having the Government take the initiative and get a decree which shall be binding upon the railroad company, and then put the lands upon the market.

While we have the right as the owners of these lands, having sold them on a condition subsequent to make a re-entry for condition broken, or to do what is equivalent to that in law, to pass this bill declaring the lands forfeited, after all, this legislative declaration is not binding on the railroad company. That is the trouble. A judgment of a court in a proceeding in which the railroad company was a party would be binding; it would be conclusive upon all parties before the court and upon their privies in interest. I feel if the bill passes in the shape in which it is reported that we shall multiply all over this country just the difficulties which the settlers on the Des Moines land grant in Iowa are now having.

It seems to me, therefore, that it would be wiser to establish this forfeiture which we declare here, and which I think we ought to declare by some competent judicial proceeding, and when it has been established by a judgment that will bind the railroad company and bind the mortgagees and bind everybody having an adverse claim, then put the lands on the market and sell them when we can give a clear title to the people who get them.

I am decidedly in favor, in all cases where it can equitably be done, of proceeding to declare the forfeiture; I think in some of these instances it was a mistake that it was not done long ago; but I have great difficulty, and I am inclined to support the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, for the reason that it settles the question as to our being the owner of the lands before we put them on the market to sell them; and I do not see how the question can be settled in any other way.

Mr. MAXEY. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to a trouble in my mind. If these people have a right, inchoate or complete, legal or equitable, under that clause of the Constitution which says that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, I do not see how we can deprive them of the right to go into court, whether we say so in the bill or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator from Texas. I think if we pass this measure we have simply done that which declares the forfeiture.

Mr. MAXEY. Precisely.

Mr. HARRISON. Then whether there has been a breach of condition subsequent, as we have declared in the bill, is a matter to be settled by the courts. I suppose nobody else can settle it.

Mr. MAXEY. It is a matter for the courts, and whether we put that provision in or not, we can not deprive them of the right to go to the courts.

Mr. INGALLS. The question is as broad as it is long, in my judgment. The Constitution declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that an act of Congress is not due process of law. That has passed into the settled determinations of the judicial power of this country as the interpretation of that clause of the Constitution. Therefore, if the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, by virtue of the original act, acquired title or obtained a vested interest in and to a portion of this land grant, the act of Congress, in my judgment, that we may pass declaring a forfeiture will be ineffective so far as the divesting of their right or title is concerned.

I do not believe it is within the power of Congress, I am very confident it is beyond the power of Congress, if the Atlantic and Pacific or any of the other land-grant railroads have acquired by virtue of a previous act of Congress right or title, legal or equitable, to one acre or to a hundred million acres of the public domain, to deprive them of that right by an act of Congress. If we pass an act of Congress declaring the forfeiture of their title and attempting to deprive them of rights they may have previously acquired, I assume that they will proceed at once to test the constitutionality of that act and of our power to pass it. If the grant that they have received or that they claim they have received is valuable, they will contend for it. So I do not see the difficulty that the Senator from Indiana apprehends.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will allow me, the difficulty is just this: Suppose the Senator's idea as to what course the railroad company will pursue be true, and that very soon after the passage of this bill they bring some suit and test it in some way.

Mr. INGALLS. It can be just as well tested on one acre as on the entire grant.

Mr. HARRISON. That suit may drag on and will drag on probably for years. In the mean time the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to go on and sell to settlers; settlers will be moving in and taking their patents and locating all along on these lands. If the decision should be untimately against the United States, we shall have put in under a statute of the United States these settlers, and the question in adjusting their rights as to what the Government shall do or what the railroad company ought to do is involved exactly as in the case in Iowa and the case in Wisconsin.

Mr. INGALLS. No.

Mr. HARRISON. So it seems to me. If the Senator himself had sold land upon a condition subsequent, and believed the condition to be broken and made the declaration or the entry which should declare the condition to be broken so far as he could, if his title was involved in doubt, until he or his adversary had procured a settlement of it he would not want to go on and divide the land into town lots and sell it.

Mr. INGALLS. The law's delay, which has been the reproach of jurisprudence for many centuries, would apply in the one case as well as the other. While it is true that there might be dilatory proceedings in the effort of the corporation to test the validity of the act of Congress, it is equally true that there would be delay and dilatory proceedings in any effort that might be made to secure the decree of forfeiture by judicial proceeding. There is nothing gained and nothing lost one way or the other.

I assume that in case this measure should pass, which there is no question we have a right to pass, if it has no other effect it will be a declaration of an intention on the part of the grantor to resume; and then if the corporation see fit to contend and proceed in the courts to test the validity of the act of Congress, as I said before the suit may be brought as well upon one acre as upon the entire grant as it may be defined upon the map; there will be the notice of lis pendens, and whoever goes on the land will do so at his peril.

I do not regard the case as parallel to that of the Des Moines River grant or the Ontonagon grant, because, as I understand, in those cases the judicial proceedings for determination have not been had, neither has any effort to determine the right been had by any act on the part of the Government.

I have very grave doubts about the wisdom or propriety of the legislation here invoked. There are cases where this power of Congress has been invited to which I should not, under any circumstances, give my assent. But it appears from the investigation of the committee that there was no effort at compliance on the part of the railroad corporation with the terms of the grant until long after the period when it expired by the terms of the original act of Congress. So far as I can see there is a very strong prima facie case made up in favor of the Government and against the corporation. Relying upon the report of the committee, therefore, I shall with something of reluctance give my support to the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to say with reference to the matter of fact that he is under a misapprehension. From three to four hundred miles, either by construction or by purchase, came into the possession of the company before the expiration of the original limit.

Mr. PLUMB. But not on the line of the road as shown by the charter.

Mr. BLAIR. It was from Springfield, Mo., westward, and so far as Vinita, some thirty-four miles, into the Indian Territory. That is my recollection in regard to it. Then the line acquired by purchase was practically the same line, for the reason that the corporation which was expected to connect at the easterly terminus failed to build its road, and the company was obliged to do that in order to have the line available.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of February last, a report of the Secretary of State relative to the papers on file in the Department of State touching the unsettled claims of citizens of the United States against France for spoliations prior to July 31, 1801.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 3, 1884.

GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War, returned to the Senate according to its request.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. LOGAN, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. MAXEY were appointed.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SERVICE.

Mr. MAHONE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds report to the Senate on Tuesday after the first Monday in December next a comprehensive system of telegraph and telephone for the Government service in Washington on the Waring or other system of underground cable, presenting in detail the same and an itemized estimate of the cost. Also the cost per annum for rentals and maintenance at which the existing service stands the Government.

ORDNANCE AND GUNNERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints under the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] yesterday and adopted to-day, to inquire into the steel-producing question, &c., the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 6925) to amend sections 4381 and 4382 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to fees levied and collected from the owners and masters of vessels in domestic commerce; and

A bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM H. FORNEY of Alabama, and Mr. J. WARREN KEIFER of Ohio managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House and accede to their request for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 3, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDALL, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. KEIFER be the managers of said conference on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAWES, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

CALIFORNIA INDIANS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask leave to offer a resolution to lie over under the rule and to be considered to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to offer at this time a resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the provisions of the resolution of the Senate adopted June 11, 1884, instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into the condition of the several tribes and bands of Indians in the Indian Territory, &c., be extended to and embrace therein the Indians upon the several reservations in California; and that the said inquiry be directed particulary to the Round Valley Indian reservation in said State; and that full investigation be made into the present and past management of said reservation and all abuses of the rights and interests of the Indians thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution being offered at this time? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be printed and go over until to-morrow.

CATHARINE H. GLICK.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has kindly agreed to yield to me for a moment. Some days ago the Senate passed a bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, late surgeon of the Fortieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions informs me that the purpose of the committee was to have reported the House bill so that when it was passed by the Senate it would become a law. I thereupon asked for the return of the bill which the Senate passed. It has been returned and is upon the table. I ask unanimous consent at this time to put the House bill upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. 6514) for the relief of Catharine H. Glick. [A pause.] The Chair was mistaken in stating that the Senator from Indiana reported the bill from the Committee on Pensions. He states that he is authorized by the Committee on Pensions to bring the bill to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], is just coming in. I was stating, if the Senator will give me his attention, that in conference with the chairman I was informed that it was the purpose of the committee to report the House bill in the case of Mrs. Glick, and on that account I asked the return of the Senate bill. It has been returned, and I am asking for the consideration of the House bill at this time, and I ventured to state that it met with the approval of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I understand the case, the Senate passed a bill precisely like the House bill and I think we might as well take up the House bill now and pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 6514. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the House bill be now considered.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Catharine H. Glick, widow of Dr. Elias B. Glick, late a surgeon in the Fortieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VOORHEES. If necessary I shall move to postpone indefinitely the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, late surgeon of the Fortieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. It is very difficult to consider this bill in the order in which it ought to be considered with the great number of interruptions that are necessary at this time. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has suggested that this subject is as broad as it is long, by which I understand him to mean that the remedies in favor of persons whose rights may be affected by this legislation are quite as good under the existing law as they would be under the amendment if it should be adopted. The trouble about that suggestion is this: The Government of the United States can not be sued by one of its citizens except in virtue of a special act of Congress authorizing a suit to be brought. The rights which are involved in this litigation are private rights, whether they are rights of corporate bodies or of citizens. If we allow this matter to go on after we have declared the forfeiture, and allow citizens in collateral proceedings, as they would be certain to do, to test the validity of our action and the extent to which it is valid, we shall encumber the people of this country with a vast amount of litigation really resulting in no good.

I will give an illustration of that. This land grant is forfeited under the provisions of the bill as it passed the House. That bill goes on to relegate the lands to the public domain, and brings in the rights of all persons who might be upon the public domain in accordance with their respective claims, and they are very variant and almost innumerable. One of those persons, whether it be a bondholder, a pre-emptor, a homestead settler, or whoever he may be, brings his action not against the Government of the United States, for he can not sue the United States, but against some person in possession. That party sets up the title of the United States. The suit may be brought in one of the Territorial courts; it may be brought in one of the State courts of California or Missouri, or wherever the land may be. If the land lies in the Indian Territory, of course suit could not be brought anywhere. The courts go on in that case and in a great many other cases of like character that would spring up throughout the length and breadth of the entire land grant after we had declared that the lands were forfeited and had become the property of the United States. The cases are settled, one court deciding in one direction and another in another, conflicting decisions, which have been heretofore a source of unmeasured trouble and difficulty in our legislation and in our dealing with the public domain. The courts of the Northwestern States are absolutely filled up with litigations of an inconsequential character brought by A against B, in which it is attempted to settle all these great questions which we are now trying to deal with in Congress.

It was the intention of the committee to supply to the people who might be concerned in these land grants, whether corporations or private citizens, a remedy for the purpose of contesting in a suit with the Government of the United States these grave questions and settling them once and forever, settling in one suit those controversies which have spread over the country and involve a great number of suits. Consequently the Committee on Public Lands in another bill identical in principle with my amendment, which was reported by the majority of the committee to this body, have provided a remedy precisely like the one I offer to put into the bill by my amendment, requiring the Government of the United States to file a bill in equity in the nature of a bill of interpleader so as to settle all the material controversies between the Government and persons claiming under any law of the United States. That reaches every person in absolute or material interest connected with these affairs.

Another section of the bill proceeds, however, to admit those parties who are not necessary parties, but may be proper parties, to file their petitions and bring their controversies before the court if they see proper to do so in preference to going to the local courts, the State courts; and thereupon the court examines the petition, and if it finds that the settlement of the question presented in the petition is necessary for the doing of complete and full justice in the cause, the court will take jurisdiction of that matter and settle that also, discriminating in the bill between those who are necessary parties in order to determine the full measure of the right of the case and those who may become proper parties upon petition to settle rights as between themselves. These rights are not mere private quarrels or controversies between citizens, but they must be rights that arise under the laws of the United States, and only in consequence thereof.

I regret, I do not hesitate to express the regret, that this bill could not have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that this whole subject could have undergone a very thorough investigation. Nevertheless, in offering the amendment which I now offer and in reporting the general bill which is on the Calendar, substantially the same with this amendment from the Committee on Public Lands, I have consulted the action taken by the Committee on the Judiciary hitherto. They have made various reports, particularly in the Des Moines case, in which precisely the doctrine of this amendment is incorporated by the Judiciary Committee. I have also since that time taken the liberty privately to present the language of this amendment to various members of that committee, and they all concur that the amendment is properly and sufficiently guarded.

I have no ambition to be considered the author of a bill for the purpose of settling these great rights that have come forward in this way and have been carried to the Committee on Public Lands by necessity; and finding the committee in that attitude I have consulted the authorities of the Senate as far as I have been able to do, and I find that they concur with the amendment which I have had the honor to offer both in its principles and in its language. I have heard as yet no criticism upon the language of the amendment. I have heard no one suggest that there was an inadequacy of its provisions for the purpose of getting a proper judicial determination of all the rights thus presented.

Now, let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the state of the British law on this subject as contrasted with the state of the American law. I will read an extract from Blackstone's Commentaries. Speaking of inquests in reference to the forfeiture of land titles, he says:

> These inquests of office were devised by law as an authentic means to give the king his right by solemn matter of record, without which he, in general, can neither take nor part from anything. For it is a part of the liberties of England and greatly for the safety of the subject that the king may not enter upon and seize any man's possession upon bare surmises without the intervention of a jury.

That is the power the Crown of England has over citizens. Further on the author says:

> With regard to real property, if an office be found for the king it puts him in immediate possession, without the trouble of a formal entry, provided a subject in the like case would have had the right to enter. * * * If the king's escheator or sheriff seize lands into the king's hand without cause, upon taking them out of the king's hand again the party shall have the mesne profits restored to him.

Again, speaking of the procedure and of the rights of the subject in England under such proceedings as we are having now, "office found" in England, a declaration of forfeiture here, he says:

> In order to avoid the possession of the crown, acquired by the finding of such office, the subject may not only have his petition of right, which discloses new facts not found in the office, and his monstrans de droit, which relies on the facts as found; but, also, he may (for the most part) traverse or deny the matter of fact itself, and put it in trial by the common-law process of the court of chancery; yet still, in some special cases, he hath no remedy left but a mere petition of right, * * * the party traversing is considered as the plaintiff, and must, therefore, make out his own title as well as impeach that of the crown, and then shall have judgment quod manus domini regis amoveantur, &c.

The proceeding in this amendment brings in the Government of the United States as the plaintiff and all the persons in interest as defendants by a bill in equity, as is suggested in the Commentaries from which I have just read, making it in the nature of a bill of interpleader, the Government asserting its right, in virtue of the declaration that we make here now, to all the lands, the corporation asserting its right by way of answer and defense, the bondholders suggesting their right by way of answer and defense, whoever else may claim under the corporation suggesting their right by way of answer and defense; and if there still may be any person whose rights are necessary or proper to be determined in order to clear the field for the resumption of title if the Government of the United States has the right to resume it, these persons come in by petition; the court considers the petition, and determines in limine whether it is proper that these persons should be admitted into the litigation. If the court shall so decide, then they become parties defendant to the cause as if they had been originally made parties defendant. That is the procedure which, as I remark again, I have not heard criticised.

It is absolutely indispensable after we have declared a forfeiture of these lands that the citizen of the United States, whether a corporation or an individual, should have the right to sue the Government to test the validity of our action and its constitutional extent and limitation, or else the Government of the United States ought to bring the suit itself in order that these parties may be made parties defendant and come in and test the right. Let me observe just one more thing, and that is that this corporation is the creature of Congress. It is not a corporation created by a State or Territorial Legislature. We created the corporation and gave it all its rights of every kind and character, and in dealing with it it is a proper thing for the Government of the United States to bring its action in the courts, so that that corporation and every person concerned in interest in any direction may have the opportunity of litigation. That is all I desire.

I do not wish that Congress shall lay its hand in the balance to weigh for or against the rights of any person upon the facts in this case. Let us leave them to the justice and judgment of the judicial tribunals of the country, so that after we have gotten through this thing we can say to the country we have done our duty as a political body in declaring that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to make assertion of its claim, and we have further done our complete and full duty by relegating the whole decision of the question into the hands of the judiciary, so that they can hear the witnesses, hear demurrers, hear pleas, try the cause, and make a final decree and dispose of it.

After these lands have been relieved of this difficulty which has grown out of Congressional action, I am quite willing that the Senator from Kansas shall have the amendment which he proposes still further to add, which is a part really of the text of the original bill coming from the House, that these lands after the final decision shall pass into the public domain and shall there become lands subject of course to all the rights of citizens which may have accrued and have the determination, I do not care which, either of the courts of justice or the Department of the Interior. But let us first get rid of the trouble which our own legislation and our own laches, if you can call it such, our delay to say the least of it, has caused in the nature of a cloud upon the title of every person concerned here. Let us remove that by the judicial authority, and then we can have a clear field for the decision of whatever other questions may come.

I should never have offered the amendment if I had not known that there was no adequate remedy provided by the laws of the United States, we having continually denied to our people the right to sue the Government except in cases where we have expressly so provided by statute.

Mr. INGALLS obtained the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to ask unanimous consent that we shall take a vote on the bill some time to-morrow. I do this because I am advised that it is important to have an executive session this evening, and there are some other matters which ought to be disposed of in order to promote the convenience of both Houses.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose we could agree to take the vote at any time to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us take it now.

Mr. PLUMB. All right; if the vote can be taken without any further debate, I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not wish to pursue the discussion if a vote can be had on the bill now.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will carry it through.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire very much to do so.

Mr. HAWLEY. Quite a number of us have bills on the Calendar upon which we would very much like to have action, and this bill is going to drawl on into next winter apparently. ["Question!" "Question!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he thinks it is best to strike out all after the word "forfeited," or whether he had not better let the words stand "and the title thereto resumed by the United States."

Mr. MORGAN. That would be one of the effects of forfeiture. In the event of the forfeiture being successfully declared the title would be resumed by the United States, but I felt and I think that those gentlemen who concurred with me on the committee felt that that would be rather a rash procedure. It throws the weight of the legislation of the Government against the claimant of the property, and he does not have a fair trial after that when we declare that the title is resumed by the Government. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] proposes that after the final decree has been passed then to have the lands revert to the Government and to be subject to disposal after the decree of the court. I do not care about its being done beforehand; I do not think it would be right.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me that we ought to make this declaration of forfeiture ample. We ought to say all we can say as a legislative body in the direction of the resumption of these lands by the Government. If we were simply to say that they are declared forfeited, I think there would be some question whether that would be sufficient.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say to him that is precisely the effect of office found after a prerogative writ and jury of inquest in Great Britain. That is precisely the effect; it goes no further, as I have read from the text of Blackstone on that question. I wanted to limit our action here precisely to the effect of office found under the common law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I do not know how he would vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] upon political questions. I observe that this is not treated as such and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] who is absent, sick, desired me to state that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If the Senator from Illinois were present, he said he would vote for the bill. I do not know how he would vote on the pending amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bayard,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,
Blair,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Pike,
Bowen,	Harris,	Lapham,	Platt,
Brown,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does seem to me that while the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama are right enough to provide for the mode of trial and to determine the effect of this legislation, yet if we are to give any vigor or force to the law at all we must go beyond a mere naked declaration of forfeiture. A mere naked declaration of forfeiture contained in the bill I do not think is worth the paper on which it is written, and I suppose as a matter of course the friends of the bill would regard it as practically its defeat. It is not worth anything at all. A mere declaration of forfeiture, leaving everything open, leaving the land in possession of the company, it seems to me is a defeat of the bill, and it had better at once be laid on the table rather than consume the few precious moments of the remainder of the session in its further consideration.

Following the forfeiture with an actual possession and recoupment of the land, I have no objection at all to the provision made for trying the rights of persons which may be involved hereafter, and I think the provisions are wisely framed by the Senator from Alabama to try the rights of the company. I do not wish, by any act or vote of mine, to interfere with or impair the rights of any corporation or any individual. I wish to keep open the doors of the courts for the protection of their rights; yet it seems to me that if the Government is to forfeit this land it ought to follow that forfeiture with actual possession.

After consultation with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], who has looked at this more than I have, perhaps, though he does not go quite so far as I do, I move to insert after the word "forfeiture" the words "and the title thereto resumed by the United States."

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that is already in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not so understand it. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Alabama came in after the words "United States," in line 18.

Mr. MORGAN. No; after the word "forfeited," in line 17.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not sufficient. I wish further to add:

And the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands declared to be a part of the public domain, but not subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States until after the termination of the legal proceedings prescribed by this act.

Mr. PLUMB. I have an amendment in regard to that part of the section which I think will better accomplish the idea which the Senator from Ohio has in view.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read, and perhaps I shall accept it.

Mr. PLUMB. I propose to add at the close of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama:

And such lands as may be declared by the final judgment herein provided for to be the property of the United States shall upon the rendition of such judgment become a part of the public domain, and be subject to disposal under the general land laws of the United States as if no such grant had ever been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Government of the United States now has waited for years for the completion of the railroad, and the company have done nothing except to earn a portion of the grant. Having failed to earn the grant, the Government of the United States ought to take possession of it, holding it, however, subject in its possession to the suit to be brought under the amendment. I think it would be restored to the public domain by the judgment of the court, or at least by the subsequent action of Congress, and we may at least leave that matter for the future action of Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. There ought to be something, so that whenever it is decided these lands may be immediately open to settlement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that, but I think that might properly be left to future legislation. This will protect the rights of the United States. I submit my amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood the Senator from Alabama to insert his amendment after the words "United States," in line 18 of section 1.

Mr. MORGAN. After the word "forfeited."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question was put on striking out all after the word "forfeited," in line 17, to and including the word "stations," in line 24, and inserting the words of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama. If the Chair correctly understands the recital made by the Senator from Ohio, the words he now proposes as an amendment are a part of the very words the Senate has already voted to strike out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Entirely changed, however, in very important particulars because they are reversed in some respects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be read, after which the Chair will determine the question.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "forfeiture," in line 17, it is proposed to insert:

And the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands declared to be part of the public domain, but not subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States, until after the termination of the legal proceedings prescribed by this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. It changes the import of the words stricken out. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very anxious, for one, that this declaration of forfeiture should be ample; in other words, that we should do by this legislation all that is necessary to reinvest the Government with this title so as to enable it to proceed in the court to which this matter is to be referred for determination, having done all that it is possible for the legislative branch of the Government to do to reinvest the Government with the title to these lands. I therefore asked the Senator from Alabama, before voting on his amendment, his opinion whether the simple word "forfeiture" accomplished that purpose. I felt that there was some doubt about it, and I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio because I think it puts it beyond doubt. In other words, my objection to the bill as it came from the committee was that the Government was going into the business of selling lawsuits. That is what we were doing, not providing for any action by the Government to settle this as one question. We were proceeding to let pre-emptors and homesteaders and purchasers of the public domain take up land in small tracts and then turn them over to an endless litigation, separate lawsuits with this railroad company, to settle the question of their title. This title is involved; the railroad company will contest this forfeiture.

I think, therefore, before we sell this land we ought to settle the question of our own title to it, and that the United States Government ought to bear the burden of that litigation and settle it in one suit. I want this bill to go far enough to make the declaration of forfeiture full and complete so far as we can do it; then referring the question as to the effect of our act and the facts of the case to the courts for settlement, and when we have once got a title that we can pass to a pre-emptor or to a homesteader unclouded, then I want to see it put upon sale.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator think we should acquire a title by saying that we resume it?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that we should. I think it would be subject, of course, still to the determination of the courts. Nothing that we can do can reinvest the title, but we are to do something by legislation that will be equivalent to re-entry for condition broken.

Mr. INGALLS. If we resume the title by declaring that it is vested again in the United States, what is the use of having the judicial proceeding?

Mr. HARRISON. It is this, that before we undertake to sell the land we have ourselves instituted a proceeding in the nature of a bill quia timet, to settle the question whether we have actually been possessed and obtained title by this legislation.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is not quite clear that a declaration of resumption would be really equivalent to the reinvestment of title in the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not, but it is all we can do.

Mr. INGALLS. I should think that under those circumstances it would be a very idle and nugatory declaration if we are to proceed by judicial investigation to determine where the title is, and to avoid that result the legislative declaration that the title is in the United States is very simple.

Mr. HARRISON. Not at all. While I have not examined——

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose the court decide the other way?

Mr. HARRISON. While I have not examined this case critically, yet I understand that the Supreme Court in a case before them have said that it rested with Congress to make by law some declaration that would declare the forfeiture of land grants.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us assume for one moment that the court in this determination, that the land belongs to the railroad company, what effect then would a declaration in the bill that it belonged to the United States have?

Mr. HARRISON. None whatever, of course. The question as to whether there has been a breach of condition subsequent is one that the courts must settle, no matter what we say. If we go on and provide for selling this land and put settlers in possession under their warrants from the Government of the United States, it still remains a question which the courts will settle as between our grantee and the railroad company as to which has the superior title. But I think the words proposed by the Senator from Ohio go somewhat further and make the purpose of Congress to resume possession of this land or to make it a part of the public domain clear and explicit, and then postpone the selling of this land to individual buyers until we have, by the judicial proceedings prescribed in this bill, established our title to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the words are very material, because they are equivalent to a re-entry, so far as the Government needs to do that for the purpose of asserting its intention to oust the possession of the railroad company and to dispose of its claim of title. The words of the bill, as I supposed they had been left in lines 17 and 18, I think would accomplish that purpose; and if, as my colleague says, the court should decide the title in the railroad company beyond the power of Congress to reach it, then of course it would not amount to anything any more than a re-entry of a private person would on an estate which he had granted away on a condition which subsequently proved not to have been fulfilled.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in preparing my amendment I had the full intent and purpose of putting the Government of the United States in the possession of all its rights under this grant. What are those rights? Assuming, or admitting rather for the sake of the argument, not according to the way the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company looks at it, but for the sake of the argument, that upon the failure of that company to complete its line within the period prescribed in the act the lands absolutely revert to the United States, putting it upon that hypothesis, the words which are in this amendment are all that are necessary to cause the reversion. I will illustrate it, if the Senate will bear with me for a moment. A private man makes a grant of lands upon condition subsequent. That condition is not complied with, or it is broken. That man has a right of entry upon his lands in consequence of the breach of that condition. His entry made in that way is exactly in conformity with the law; he is not a trespasser, in other words, because he has reserved the right of entry in possession in the deed making the grant. So the very moment he enters into the possession the title unites with the possession and he is in, as the books say, as of his former right.

Now the Government of the United States, or any other government, having made a grant of land and not being capable of taking pedis possessio, being itself an incorporeal establishment, through its legislative authority makes a declaration of its right of entry; and in Schulenberg vs. Harriman the Supreme Court has held that that declaration is equivalent to an entry by a private owner, it is equivalent under the English law to office found. The entry by the private owner, or office found under the English law, unites the possession with the title. The party is in as of his former right.

Here we make a declaration that these lands are forfeited. The very moment that that declaration becomes a law, the Government of the United States is in possession of these lands, and if the title unites with the possession because of the fact that the forfeiture has occurred, then the Government's title is full and complete. If, however, it turns out that the cause of forfeiture did not actually exist, the Government loses its title, and the courts under this power, as the court of equity in England would have done, restore the possession to the original grantee. That is the condition of the thing.

Now, suppose we go further, and not merely declare a forfeiture of the land, but also make a legislative declaration that the title is resumed to the United States or reconferred on the United States, then we do that or attempt to do that by legislation which is the part only of the judicial authority. The Government of the United States—there can be no mistake about it—gains every right under a declaration of forfeiture that it could gain by the most positive declaration of the result of that.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him why, if we declare this to be a part of the public domain and the United States should direct the Secretary of the Interior to enter, we are not settling legal questions, we are not taking it out of the domain of the courts any more than in the case of a private grant on condition subsequent where the grantor enters as of his original right? Then I want to say to the Senator, as some of us have agreed with his views in the main, that this can not do any harm if he be right in saying that if it is a declaration of something that should be reserved for the courts the courts will say so, and it is simply a concession to some of us who think that the language as it stands does not go far enough to do that which we ought to do in this case. I hope, therefore, he will let the amendment come in.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Indiana is an excellent lawyer. I have had good opportunity to observe that since I have been on this floor with him; and he will not say that it is necessary for the Congress of the United States to direct or to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into possession. He has got no possession of the public lands. The Government of the United States as a government takes possession in virtue of its legislation, and the moment that we declare a forfeiture of lands granted by the Government, that instant of time we are in possession, the Government is in possession as a government.

I have no objection to those words coming in here except that I think they will mar the sense of the statute and might induce some judge to suppose that Congress after all in granting this relief to its own citizens had loaded it down with a declaration that it makes no difference, as the Senator from Kansas suggested, what you have got to present to the court; the question is already decided against you, if the title has been resumed.

I want to leave the title to be disposed of by the courts after the possession, after the right of entry, and all that belongs to these facts by virtue of the operation of law is secured as I think in the form of the amendment I presented. I have no pride of opinion about it. I want to do precisely what the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Indiana are trying to accomplish, and I believe I have secured it in the amendment. But still if the Senate wants to put in other words there which I think will rob the court perhaps of its jurisdiction to try the title, they may put them in, but I think they are dangerous words to those persons who claim rights against the United States for us here to say that we not only resume possession as upon office found, and not only resume possession as a private owner would who had made a grant upon condition subsequent that was forfeited, but we go further and by legislative declaration we resume the title, it makes no difference how the judge may decide.

The Senator from Kansas put a question very pertinently I thought to the Senator from Indiana—what will be the attitude of the case if after we make the declaration the judge still decides that the title is in the claimant? How are we to get along with that? I really think that the apprehensions of Senators on that subject are not well founded. They are not founded in the state of the law. This is a new question, and I venture my opinion very gingerly about it. At the same time we have got no analogies that we can appeal to except those derived from the English common law, and under that system I think it is very clear that as far as we ought to go, as far as we need to go, is to declare the forfeiture of the land, which puts us in as of our former right.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was about to move an executive session, in the hope that we might return to legislative session in a few minutes and finish this bill. There is important business to be attended to in executive session.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote now.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; I shall not make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to add the words which will be found in line 20, commencing with the word "but" down to and including the word "stations," in line 24 of the original bill, as follows:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those are the very words which the Senate has stricken out.

Mr. PLUMB. But in connection with other words.

Mr. INGALLS. Much more was stricken out.

Mr. PLUMB. This is only a portion of what was stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read, after which the Chair will decide.

Mr. PLUMB. I will move it as a separate section according to a suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, commencing with the word "nothing:"

Nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that this is the identical language which has been stricken from the bill by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to insert those words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the question be taken on restoring these words to the bill as an addition to the amendment agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. As a separate section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a separate section. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is received. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. JONAS. I ask that the bill be read at the desk as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill as amended in Committee of the Whole will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all the lands, excepting the right of way and lands for stations, heretofore granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company by an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast," approved July 27, 1866, and subsequent acts and joint resolutions of Congress, which are adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of the main line of said road, embraced within both the granted and indemnity limits, as contemplated to be constructed under and by the provisions of the said act of July 27, 1866, and acts and joint resolutions subsequent thereto and relating to the construction of said road and telegraph, be, and the same are hereby, declared forfeited, and the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands declared to be part of the public domain, but not subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States until after the termination of the legal proceedings prescribed by this act: Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

SEC. 2. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited lands that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any law of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest thereon.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity, in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable.

SEC. 4. That any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands, or any part thereof, which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath; and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim is necessary to do complete justice in said cause, the court shall direct that such further proceeding be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.

SEC. 5. That the court, if it shall see fit, may tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the costs of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree therein to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court for appeals in equity cases; and the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket so that the same shall be speedily determined; but no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

SEC. 6. Nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations.

SEC. 7. That the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits," is hereby repealed.

Mr. PLUMB. I move in the first line of section 3 of the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair will state that the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, unless the Senator proposes to amend one of the amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. I propose to amend one of the amendments by inserting the word "immediately," in line 3 of section 3 of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, so that it shall be made the duty of the Department of Justice to immediately proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 3, after the word "Justice," it is proposed to insert the word "immediately;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, immediately to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. HILL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 2022, Order of Business 474.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate proceed at this time to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 474, Senate bill No. 2022, to establish a postal-telegraph system.

Mr. INGALLS. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HILL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays being ordered and taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Bayard,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Butler,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,	Vest.

NAYS—31.

Blair,	Groome,	Mahone,	Pike,
Bowen,	Harris,	Manderson,	Platt,
Brown,	Harrison,	Maxey,	Plumb,
Call,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Saulsbury,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,	Sewell,
Colquitt,	Logan,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.
Dolph,	McMillan,	Palmer,

ABSENT—33.

Allison,	Fair,	Jackson,	Sherman,
Anthony,	Farley,	Kenna,	Slater,
Beck,	Frye,	Lamar,	Voorhees.
Camden,	George,	Lapham,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Williams,
Conger,	Gorman,	Miller of N. Y.,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Hale,	Ransom,
Dawes,	Hampton,	Riddleberger
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Sabin,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, the bill being up——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let it be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 2022) to establish a postal-telegraph system."

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator to allow me to call the attention of the Senate to the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it desired to have action on that report now?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. The conference report has been submitted and is on the table of the Presiding Officer now. It ought to be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A conference report is in order if the Senator desires to present one.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I have the conference report on the Post-Office appropriation bill. I am advised on very good authority that in view of the action of the House receding from the disagreement to the amendments made by the Senate, it is not necessary so far as the bill itself is concerned that this report should be presented. At the same time it is proper that the record of the Senate should disclose the fact of the report having been made in order to have a continuous narrative of the proceedings. I therefore present the report of the conference committee on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that instead of being read it may appear in the RECORD. I do not make any motion in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be, Will the Senate agree to the conference report? And by unanimous consent the Senate may act upon it without its being read, but it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLUMB. That is a question I desire to have settled: if it is necessary to take action on this report. I simply present the report in order that the RECORD may show what has actually taken place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the Senate must act upon the conference report by agreeing or disagreeing to it. By unanimous consent the Senate can act upon it without its being read or after the reading. ["No objection."]

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill has passed, I understand.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the bill has gone to the President.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand it has.

Mr. HAWLEY. The House has concurred with the Senate in the passage of the bill, and this paper is dead paper.

Mr. PLUMB. That is true, but at the same time the records of the Senate should show exactly what was done and how the result was arrived at.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was addressing myself more particularly to the proposition that it was necessary to take a vote. It seems to me it would be absurd to take a vote when the vote has no effect upon anything.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There is nothing to vote upon.

Mr. HAWLEY. General consent might spread this on the record for the satisfaction of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the report be placed on record without any further action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the conference committee on the Post-Office appropriation bill be spread on the record without further action by the Senate. It seems to me the report should be out of the custody of the conference committee and in the possession of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already ruled that the Senate must act on the conference report by agreeing or disagreeing to it, or postponing its consideration. The Senate could, by unanimous consent, act upon it without its being read, but the record must show that the Senate agreed to it or disagreed to it.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me we can get around the trouble by simply receiving it as information. That is what the Senator from Kansas is driving at.

Mr. PLUMB. That is what I suggest.

Mr. HARRISON. What objection is there to having it read? It is brief.

Mr. PLUMB. It simply records a disagreement between the two Houses, and that would necessitate the necessity of taking up the question whether the Senate would adhere to its position. I only want it on record in such a way that our Journal shall show exactly what was done.

Mr. HAWLEY. Our record does show by a message from the House that the House receded on the identical bill, and concurred in the passage of it. The record on the bill is complete.

Mr. PLUMB. But it does not show that the committee had met and that a disagreement had occurred which preceded the action of the House in receding from its disagreement to our amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill has passed.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no doubt about that. I ask leave to withdraw the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas can withdraw the report if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I desire to have action of the Senate upon the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that there be laid before the Senate a House bill pending on a report from a conference committee. The Chair will lay before the Senate the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, purely as a formal matter I move the adoption of the report of the conference committee, and that will bring up the subject which has been heretofore in controversy. I wish to say now in regard to the question that I should be glad to have the Senate in some authentic way settle so far as it can what shall be made the subject of action by conference committees of the two Houses; and for the purpose of illustrating to some extent what has been done, not a long time ago, but recently, I call the attention of the Senate to the report of the conference committee upon the pension appropriation bill, which is found on page 5679 of the RECORD of June 27. It will there be seen that the conferees reported to the two Houses, and the two Houses by adopting the report have accepted a provision changing the law in regard to certain very important matters of administration in the Pension Office; and not only that, but inserting provisions which had never been in print or never been considered by either House of Congress prior to the time when they were presented in the conference report.

That is not singular, because I presume I may state what is within the knowledge of every person here, that a little over a year ago we got a tariff bill in the same way. I remember hearing a member of the committee that brought forth that bill describe in somewhat terse and lurid language the manner in which certain conclusions had been arrived at. But the fact remains that a tariff bill was prepared substantially in a committee conference a year ago last March by the conferees, or at least a considerable number of items were inserted which were not the subject of controversy between the two Houses.

I speak of this not for the purpose of justifying anything that has been done by anybody else, but for the purpose of illustrating the rule that has obtained heretofore, and also the necessity that there should be some rule of action which shall govern beyond any possible controversy. I do not care so far as I am concerned for the present or for the future within what narrow limits the action of conferees is brought. It is much easier to get along here as it is elsewhere without assuming too much responsibility, and certainly I suppose no one who may have charge of bills of any description cares to have a responsibility which is not especially committed to him by a vote of the Senate.

I could go a great deal further than I have gone in regard to what has heretofore been done in the way of legislation by conference committees; but I do not care to plead anything as a precedent for what appears in this report. I will only say that the amendment objected to was tendered to the Senate conferees by the House conferees and was accepted by the Senate conferees at the hands of the House conferees and agreed to by them as a matter proposed substantially by the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the conferees report read and then printed for the use of the Senate on a former occasion be concurred in. On that occasion the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], as the Chair recollects, raised a question of order in regard to the last amendment of the Senate, that the subject agreed to by the conferees had not been committed to the conference and was not in dispute between the two Houses, and also that it introduced legislation contrary to the rules of the Senate. If those points of order are insisted upon, the Chair will express his opinion about them. If they are not, the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Kansas. [A pause.] If there be no objection the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the conference report be adopted.

The report was concurred in.

THERESA CROSBY WATSON.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 764, being the bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson.

Mr. HAWLEY. I feel obliged to object, because I know many Senators desire an executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that a bill, the nature of which he has stated, be now considered, pending which the Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 6 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 3, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. FINERTY. I desire to state that I left the House yesterday before the vote was taken upon the Fitz-John Porter bill, and with the understanding that I was paired if that question came up. I find this morning that no pair was announced for me, and I desire to state that had I been present, I should have voted for the passage of the bill notwithstanding the veto of the President.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. A single word of personal explanation. Not having been very well for some time past, I left the Hall yesterday about 3 o'clock, not expecting that anything of importance would come up. I wish to say that had I been here I should have voted for the passage of the Fitz-John Porter bill over the President's veto.

VIOLATIONS OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. OATES. By direction of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, I ask that the Senate amendments to the House bill 6370, to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws, be taken from the Speaker's table and non-concurred in.

Mr. REED. Let the Senate amendments be read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 2, strike out the word "crime" and insert the words "of the various offenses."

In line 5, strike out "two" before the word "years" and insert "three."

In lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "beyond the reach of legal process" and insert in lieu thereof the words "absent from the district wherein the same is committed."

In line 9, strike out the word "action" and insert the word "proceedings."

In line 11, strike out the words "pending cases" and insert in lieu thereof the words "offenses committed prior to its passage."

Also at the end of line 11 add the following:

"And provided further, That when a complaint shall be instituted before a commissioner of the United States within the period above limited the period shall be extended until the discharge of the grand jury at its next session within the district."

So that the section will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any of the various offenses arising under the internal-revenue laws of the United States unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within three years next after the commission of the offense: Provided, That the time during which the person committing the offense is absent from the district wherein the same is committed shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such proceedings: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to offenses committed prior to its passage: And provided further, That when complaint shall be instituted before a commissioner of the United States within the period above limited the period shall be extended until the discharge of the grand jury at its next session in the district."

Mr. OATES. I move that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in, and that a conference be asked.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. OATES, Mr. MCMILLIN, and Mr. PAYNE.

RELIEF FROM CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I rise to a matter of privilege, and call up the request of the Senate for a conference upon the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the request for a conference.

Mr. DUNN. Is this a public measure?

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter. A request from the other branch of Congress for a conference has always been treated as a matter of privilege.

The motion of Mr. ROSECRANS was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. ROSECRANS, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. STEELE as conferees on the part of the House.

BRANCH HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. BAIRD. I call up as a question of privilege the request of the Senate for a conference upon the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the request for a conference.

The motion of Mr. LAIRD was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. ROSECRANS, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. LAIRD as conferees on the part of the House.

INVESTIGATION OF CHARLESTOWN NAVY-YARD.

Mr. TALBOTT. I am authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask the adoption of the report and resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs for immediate consideration a resolution, which will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of not less than three members of said committee, to investigate the charges aforesaid of official misconduct on the part of Moses H. Webber in appropriating to his own use Government property in and from the United States navy-yard at Charlestown, Mass., and of requiring the hands under his control and supervision to devote their time as Government employés to the manufacture of furniture and articles of adornment for his household use; and such other charges as may come to their notice respecting the management of said navy-yard; with power to sit during the recess of Congress, to visit said navy-yard, to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer; and the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HISCOCK. I object.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask that the report and resolution be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DUNN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have a privileged report.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the Senate by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to have taken up for the action of the House the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil apppropriation bill which has just been returned.

I have not had the opportunity to call together the Committee on Appropriations for the consideration of this matter; but I think I express their wish, if I do not express the wish of any individual member of that committee I hope he will now make known his dissent, when I ask that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in.

The Senate has added to this bill appropriations amounting to more than $4,000,000. It may be right to have made those additions or it may not; the propriety of the judgment of the respective Houses on this matter may be shown by subsequent events. I have prepared, and ask the liberty of incorporating in my remarks, a brief statement of figures relating to the appropriations in the several sundry civil appropriation bills of 1883, 1884, and 1885. I do not wish to detain the House with a recital of these figures.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the statement will be published.

There was no objection. The statement is as follows:

Sundry civil bills—1883, 1884, and 1885.

	1883.	1884.	1885.
Bill as passed House	$23,976,783 66	$23,119,232 50	$20,919,400 35
Bill as passed Senate	26,547,508 38	24,565,347 47	24,937,491 28
Amount added by Senate	2,570,724 72	1,446,114 97	4,018,090 93
Amount yielded in conference	958,150 32	885,772 03	.....
Amount as a law	25,589,358 06	23,679,575 44	.....

Mr. RANDALL. I now move, and I call the previous question upon the motion, that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in; and in order to expedite action on the matter, I will add to my motion a request for a conference with the Senate.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL to non-concur in the Senate amendments and ask a conference was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. RANDALL, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. RYAN as conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the bill with the Senate amendments numbered be reprinted so as to facilitate the consideration of this subject by the Committee on Appropriations and by the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CLAIM OF NORTH CAROLINA.

On motion of Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the bill (H. R. 3037) to refund to the State of North Carolina certain moneys therein named.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COOK, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROGERS, of New York, for ten days, on business of importance.

To Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, for four days, on important business.

To Mr. PATTON, for one week.

To Mr. STEVENS, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BINGHAM, indefinitely.

To Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, from and after July 5, on account of important business.

J. W. THOMPSON.

On motion of Mr. MCCOID, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of J. W. Thompson without leaving certified copies with the Clerk of the House.

ASA FAULKNER AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. DIBRELL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the claim of Asa Faulkner, Lewis L. Faulkner, and others, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MARY E. HILL.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER, of New York, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the bill (H. R. 3712) granting a pension to Mary E. Hill, and all papers in the case, there being no adverse report.

CONSOLIDATED CLAIMS INDEX.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, and as it states more fully than I can do the reasons for passing the accompanying resolution, I ask the House to pay particular attention to its reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the following resolution, namely—

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk during the recess for the purpose of preparing a consolidated index of the 22,298 claims reported to Congress by the commissioners of claims, under the act of March 3, 1871, and subsequent acts; also for the purpose of recording the cases referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act; said clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the same compensation paid committee clerks"— having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

That under the act of March 3, 1871, establishing what is known as the Southern Claims Commission, and subsequent acts, 22,298 claims were presented, involving the sum of $60,258,150.44.

Under said acts the commissioners of claims made ten reports to Congress, of which number 17,048 were reported to Congress either favorably or unfavorably, 5,250 were forever barred under the act of June 15, 1878, and 57 were withdrawn.

The total amount allowed in the favorable reports made to Congress by the commissioners was $4,636,920.69, the amount disallowed being $55,621,229.75.

The cases reported upon favorably have been transmitted to the Treasury Department, and remain, with the evidence, upon its files as evidence of settlement.

The cases reported to Congress as disallowed remain upon the files of the House of Representatives, with but few exceptions; the original act of March 3, 1871, prohibiting the withdrawal of any claim or evidence therein without authority of Congress.

These ten reports are scattered through the files of the Forty-second, Forty-third, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, and it is of the first importance that there should be a consolidated record of these cases, giving the number of the claim as presented to the commission, its nature, the amount of the claim, the amount allowed, and such other particulars as may be necessary to fully and completely identify the claim.

This is rendered more important by the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," known as the Bowman act, under which any claim pending before a committee of either House may be transmitted to the Court of Claims and there proceeded with under such rules as the court may adopt.

Under this act numerous claims have been transferred to the Court of Claims by the committees of the House, of which no record has been made upon the Journal except in one instance.

It is desirable that there should be a complete record of cases so transferred, in order that they may be properly located or traced.

The committee believe that the importance of this work can not be overestimated.

The expense of preparing such a history or consolidated index will be but trifling, and it is believed it can be accomplished during the coming recess.

The committee therefore report back the said resolution without amendment, and recommend its adoption.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist, Mr. Speaker, as that work, in view of the statute of limitations, will be of no possible value, as these claims are all barred by express statute, that this resolution be not adopted. As they are all barred by express statute, an index of thousands and tens of thousands of claims can be of no possible value. Even if it should be of value, let me call attention to the fact that the Committee on War Claims in charge of this whole subject has two clerks, for I notice by amendment an assistant clerk has been secured—this Committee on War Claims has these two clerks; and if this work be necessary they can do it, and they will do it efficiently.

But why should we encumber our records with an index of thousands of claims which are barred by the statute of limitations and which can be of no value whatever. They are barred by the act of 1881, which has been referred to; they are excluded especially by the provisions of the Bowman bill, and I hope, as it will only unnecessarily encumber the records of the House, the gentleman will not press the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, of course I shall press what I am ordered by the committee to press. But I will say in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, that if everything he suggests was true with reference to these cases and there was not a single claim here that could be subject to legislation in this Congress or any other, it would still be well and most desirable to have a complete history and index of all such claims, so that they might be referred to and identified without difficulty at any time. I have, of course, no personal knowledge of the matter; but I am informed by those who have, and I believe it to be true, that it often happens when members of Congress from the South come here and want to find from the files the history of cases relating to their constituents, that in order to obtain such a history the clerk must go over ten voluminous annual reports to find it. Not only the files of these claims, but the records in connection with them, are in such a condition that it is a matter of economy and convenience to have this itemized list prepared.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman should remember that these cases are already disposed of.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Let me continue by saying that so far as barred cases are concerned I think if the gentleman from Indiana had listened to the reading of the report he would have found that only a small proportion of the cases referred to are actually barred. He would have discovered also that this resolution covers many claims which were not before the Southern Claims Commission at all, namely, claims referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act. But as the report states the facts in the case so clearly and conclusively I do not think I ought to take up the time of the House by any explanation. If the gentleman wants a few minutes longer I will yield to him, and will then move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG. Will my friend from Indiana permit me to make a suggestion? It occurs to me that the fact of these claims being barred by the statute of limitation would hardly prevent their being brought before Congress at some time, and hence that there would be convenience in having such an index. But I see no reason why the two clerks of the Committee on War Claims could not prepare the index.

Mr. HOLMAN. By the act of 1871, my friend will remember, creating that commission, a bar is fixed to every claim presented after a specified time; and consequently an index of that class of claims would be manifestly unnecessary, as they could readily be found by looking over, it is true, perhaps with some little trouble, several volumes of books which contain the list. But it is only a matter of a little trouble. Nothing is gained by this proposition. And I desire to call his attention again and mainly to the fact that there are already two clerks of the Committee on War Claims who can do the work.

Mr. SHELLEY. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that these claims are not before the Committee on War Claims but are on the files of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true, but they all go through the War Claims Committee. Under the law they went to the Committee on War Claims in the first instance, and were there examined. Then the reports were made to the House under the act of 1871. So that these claims have been already, and all of them, subject to review by the Committee on War Claims.

But the point I was making is that this committee has already two annual clerks; one provided for by the legislative bill passed by the House, and a provision for another has been inserted in the bill as an amendment by the Senate. If that is adopted there will be two clerks to that committee able to perform this work. One of them I know to be an exceedingly competent clerk, who has been connected with the committee for a number of years. They can perform this duty, and I trust that there will be no unnecessary increase of the number of the employés of the House. I think the employés have been already increased beyond the necessities of the service.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I now yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] three minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this report has been unanimously indorsed by the Committee on Accounts, and I must say I think the House should also unanimously indorse it.

I for one can bear witness to the fact that for several years my constituents who had presented war claims here and claims before the Court of Claims have written me making inquiries as to what had become of them, and I have had a deal of trouble because of having no guide in my search for the action taken upon them. On applying to the clerk, I found I could get but little information from him in several cases, and only that after much search and trouble on his part. We have had all general claims against the Government indexed, and as a member of the Committee on Claims I know how exceedingly valuable it is to every member of that committee and indeed to every member of the House. Besides, sir, over 1,000 claims are pending against the Government. These claims range all the way from a million of dollars down, and the Committee on Claims have not been able to discharge their duties as expeditiously and efficiently as could be desired because of the difficulties connected with the matter of investigation and decision. Consequently they have been seeking relief not only as to the mode of lifting the heavy burden from their own shoulders, but from the Government by dumping them upon the Court of Claims under the Bowman act. I submit, therefore, that the Congress could not spend any portion of the public money in a better way than that proposed by the resolution of the committee on accounts now before us.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution if it has had the consideration of the Committees on Claims of this House; whether it is recommended by either the War Claims Committee or the Committee on Claims?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I am not able to answer that question. But as it has been asked I will say it was recommended one year ago unanimously by the committee as a desirable thing and only failed for lack of time at the close of the session.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It will no doubt be very convenient for claim agents, but I do not know that either of the Committees on Claims desires it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It will be very convenient for many Congressmen who have to be claim agents in a proper sense of the term. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 29.

Mr. LE FEVRE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WARNER, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ADAMS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 134, noes 35.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENSUS FOR 1885.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the acting Superintendent of the Census, with accompanying papers, relative to a proposed census of the States and Territories of the United States for 1885; which was referred to the Select Committee to Ascertain the Results of the Tenth Census, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a bill for grading and bowldering street adjacent to the United States court-house and post-office at Indianapolis, Ind., and recommending its payment; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. W. H. ENGLISH AND OTHERS.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report sent up by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAMMOND, from the select committee investigating charges against Hon. William H. English and others, ex-members of Congress, submits the following report:

The resolution of the House, under and by virtue of which your committee have been acting, instructed the committee "to inquire and report to the House whether or not Hon. William H. English, an ex-member of this House, has violated the privileges thereof in the contested-election case of English vs. Peelle" * * * and "whether any ex-member of the House, employed as agent or attorney in any contested-election case here pending, or for any railroad or other corporation, or of persons having any claim pending here, has during this session abused the privileges allowed him under the thirty-fourth rule of the House, and report, if any, who they are and how they have abused said privilege."

The thirty-fourth rule of the House is:

"OF ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

"The persons hereinafter named, and none other, shall be admitted to the Hall of the House or rooms leading thereto, viz: * * * ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim or directly in any bill pending before Congress."

In the light of the debate which led to the adoption of the resolution and immediately preceded it we might well consider that its only purpose was to learn whether Mr. English and other ex-members of Congress had violated said rule. We think that the words "claim" and "bill" in the rule should be construed liberally, but that the word "interest" therein has been uniformly held to cover only a pecuniary interest. The House has not made relationship to a contestant or contestee or to one interested in a bill or claim a reason for excluding an ex-member from the floor of the House. Therefore we report that the Hon. William H. English did not violate said Rule XXXIV by coming upon the floor of the House pending the contested-election case of his son against Mr. Peelle.

We do report that Jeremiah Wilson, J. H. McGowan, S. S. Burdett, Eppa Hunton, and Green B. Raum were ex-members employed as attorneys for corporations and persons having pecuniary interests in claims or bills pending here during this session of Congress and did come upon the floor of the House. Technically they had no right to come upon the floor while the House was in session. But your committee reports that nothing contained in the testimony taken, and which is submitted as part of this report, shows any conduct by them while on the floor calling for animadversion.

It will be observed, however, that the first clause of the resolution, in words, does not confine the inquiry as to Mr. English to his conduct as ex-member, nor suggest anything about Rule XXXIV of the House. He is there spoken of as an ex-member, in describing him; but the inquiry is by those words to be not whether he abused the privileges of the floor under Rule XXXIV, but whether he had violated the privileges of the House in the contested-election case of his son against Mr. Peelle.

All that the committee have been able to learn touching his conduct in that regard is fully set forth in the evidence herewith submitted.

That Mr. English did go to see members of the House at their rooms and in the House in session and seek to induce them to vote for his son is true. But in no case was that done otherwise than quietly and in such ways as were not calculated to disturb the business of the House. There is no shadow of evidence of any effort by Mr. English to use any corrupt means or to suggest any corrupt motive for the consideration of any member in the case of English vs. Peelle.

By the Constitution the "House may determine the rules of its proceedings." It must have authority to maintain its privileges and be the judge of their infringement. But it must proceed according to law. Many causes are cited in our manual in which the House has asserted and acted upon that right. They were, as to parties, attempting to participate in the debates without being members of the House (Journal 1, 4, p. 407); of persons refusing to testify before committees of the House (Journal 1, 12, p. 280, and 2, 33, p. 315); of persons offering money to influence the conduct of members (Journal 1, 15, pp. 119–154); of a stenographer of the House who committed an assault in the session of the House (Journal 1, 24, p. 1021), or for assaults upon members of the House, as in the case of Houston and Woods (Journal 1, 22, pp. 736, 750, and 2, 41, pp. 1199–1200).

May, on Law of Parliament (page 82), divides breaches of privilege into, first, disobedience to general orders or rules of either house; second, disobedience to particular orders; third, indignities offered to the character or proceedings of Parliament; and, fourth, assaults upon its members or reflections upon their character and conduct in Parliament, or interferences with officers of the house in discharge of their duty.

Cushing, in his work on the Laws and Practice of Parliamentary Assemblies, quotes the extreme views of a member of Parliament, who, in 1771, said that one charged with a breach of privilege should not be heard by counsel, because he thought parliamentary privileges were and should be undefined. The comments of Mr. Cushing are that privilege was then "what each house chose to make so upon the particular occasion." But he added this: "Since the period above mentioned a different doctrine has been established as to the nature of parliamentary privilege, which is now regarded as a part of the law of the land evidenced by the customs and usages of Parliament when not specifically defined by statute and incapable of enlargement by the resolutions or proceedings of either house."

Your committee have found no custom or usage of Parliament which would justify them in concluding that the conduct of Hon. William H. English, as disclosed by the evidence, was a breach of the privileges of the House in said election case, and therefore recommend that the whole matter be laid upon the table.

Mr. MILLARD. I desire to present a minority report and ask that it may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks leave to present the views of the minority. If there be no objection they will be presented and read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHARGES AGAINST HON. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH.

Mr. MILLARD, from the committee, submitted the following views of the minority:

The undersigned, a minority of the select committee appointed to investigate whether or not Hon. William H. English violated the privileges of the House during the consideration of the election case of English vs. Peelle, begs leave to make the following report:

While the contested-election case of English vs. Peelle was under consideration in the House Mr. HORR, of Michigan, rose in his seat and made the following statement:

"Mr. Speaker, no ex-member of Congress has the right to the floor if he takes it and then abuses its privileges by attempting to influence legislation here. I now rise to say that it has been brought to my notice by a Democratic member of this House that an ex-member of Congress, who is the father of one of the litigants in this case, has been on the floor of the House soliciting members, sending for them, taking them into consultation, and attempting to influence their votes in this case. If that be true, it is such a violation of the dignity and integrity of this House that it ought not to go unnoticed."

The charge of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan was met with an emphatic denial from various gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House. Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, obtaining the floor, replied as follows: "The father of the contestant would be unnatural if he did not take the deepest interest in his son's contest," and that he was a witness to the fact that that gentleman had exercised the most careful propriety in connection therewith. After some considerable discussion the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That a select committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker, and it is hereby instructed to inquire and report to the House whether or not Hon. William H. English, an ex-member of the House, has violated the privileges thereof in the contested-election case of English vs. Peelle; and said committee shall inquire and report whether any ex-member of the House employed as agent or as attorney in any contested-election case here pending, or for any railroad or other corporation of persons, has during this session abused the privileges allowed him under the thirty-fourth rule of the House, and report, if any, who they are and how they abused said privileges."

It will be observed that the resolution directs the committee to inquire and report to the House not whether Hon. William H. English had violated any of the provisions of Rule XXXIV, but whether or not, after coming upon the floor under and by virtue of this rule, he did not by his subsequent conduct violate the privileges of the House. Rule XXXIV only goes to the point of admitting ex-members of Congress to the floor, and they are entitled to this privilege only when they are not interested in any claim or directly in any bill pending before Congress. The charge of the distinguished member from Michigan was that Mr. English had been engaged in lobbying in the interest of his son, the contestant, while upon the floor of the House, and while the case was actually under consideration. This charge, we submit, has been sustained by the evidence taken by the subcommittee.

The evidence shows that he came to Washington on the 1st day of May last; that from the day of his coming down to the final vote, which was taken on the 22d day of May, he was constantly engaged in attempting to influence the votes of the members of this House; that before the Committee of Elections had made their report, and while they had the case under consideration, he visited members of the committee at their respective abodes in Washington and tried to induce them to report in favor of the contestant.

Mr. English, before the committee, admitted that in the absence of Mr. COOK, who was one of the subcommittee of elections having the case in charge, he called upon COOK's wife and induced her to use her influence with her husband to get him to report in favor of the contestant. He also testified that at his request Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, called upon Mr. COOK at his rooms and tried to induce him to stand by the contestant. Mr. English also admitted before the subcommittee that he told COOK upon the floor of the House that it was for the interest of the Greenback party in Indiana that his son should be seated. Knowing COOK to be a Greenbacker, he said he "thought he might reach him by this kind of argument." Mr. S. W. PEEL, of Arkansas, testified that while the case was under consideration, and after he had voted, the distinguished ex-member came to his seat and asked him "if he was going to stand by and see a Democrat slaughtered in this way." That he replied "that if it were at the polls he would vote for his son, but the evidence did not show that his son was elected," whereupon English replied: "All right; time will bring us all even." (See evidence of Mr. PEEL at pages 48 and 49 of the printed testimony before the committee.)

At page 58, of the printed evidence the Hon. William H. English testified as follows:

Q. Did you discuss the effect it would have if Mr. Peelle were allowed to take his seat?

A. I think it was spoken of with a view to its political effect.

Q. Did you talk to anybody else, state to anybody else the effect it would have in Indiana if your son were ousted?

A. I did.

Q. To whom?

A. To every member with whom I talked. We made no concealment about it.

Q. What did you represent the effect would be?

A. I said to my friends—political friends—those who asked me about it, that I thought it was highly desirable for the party to stand together upon the question; that that was the policy in Congress when I was there, and that they ought not to divide upon this election case. I said the effect would be injurious to the party in the country.

The Hon S. W. MOULTON, of Illinois, testified that before he voted English came to his seat upon the floor of the House and stated to him that if he could not vote for his son not to make a record; that he could step out. That English also stated to him that they had had a good deal of trouble in Indiana, and that it was everything to them that his son should be seated.

Mr. ORLANDO B. POTTER, of New York, testified before the subcommittee "that while in his seat and while the case was actually under consideration he received a note from Hon. William H. English to come to the cloak-room in the area of the Hall upon the Democratic side of the House. That he complied with the request; that when he reached the cloak room he found that English had with him Senator VOORHEES, of Indiana. Up to this time Mr. POTTER says that he had intended to speak in favor of Mr. Peelle, and he so stated to Mr. English. He also told English that he had carefully examined the case and that in his opinion Mr. Peelle was elected. That Mr. English importuned him not to speak against his son. That Senator VOORHEES made the same request; and out of deference to their joint request he did not speak. He testifies further that on his way back to his seat from the interview he did tell Mr. HORR that he thought it was an outrage that an ex-member of Congress should be upon the floor attempting to influence members in a case of this kind; that in his judgment whether English or Peelle was entitled to the seat was a judicial and not a political question.

In view of the foregoing evidence we submit that the charge of the gentleman from Michigan has been fully sustained and more than sustained. The conduct of the Hon. William H. English, as established by his own admissions and the evidence of ORLANDO B. POTTER, of New York, S. W. MOULTON, of Illinois, and S. W. PEEL, of Arkansas, while upon the floor of the House and while the case was actually under consideration, was characterized by Mr. POTTER an outrage, a gross violation of the courtesy extended to him by the House, and an insult to the honor and integrity of every member upon this floor.

Mr. English claimed before this subcommittee that before coming upon the floor he sought the advice of the Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, of Indiana, but Judge HOLMAN says that the question of the election case was not discussed or referred to. Mr. HOLMAN was asked whether or not he intimated to Mr. English directly or indirectly that after being upon the floor he could importune members. His answer was, "Oh, no, sir."

Other questions were put to him, including the following:

Q. Did you advise him that way?

A. No, sir.

Q. What do you understand by the term lobbying while on the floor of the House? You have spoken of the rule and its force.

A. Yes, sir. I suppose in its general sense it would have reference to any action to influence the action of the House on any subject.

Q. Any interference or request made?

A. Any intercession or otherwise for lobbying is carried on; that is, attempts to influence the action of Congress by persons in the lobby is in progress, I take it for granted, as well when the House is in session as when it is not in session.

In the judgment of the undersigned the conduct of Hon. William H. English, after being allowed to come upon the floor through the courtesy of the House, was improper and a flagrant violation of its privileges. That this House owes it to itself, its honor, and integrity that such conduct should not go unnoticed.

Whether English or Peelle was entitled to a seat in this House was not a political but a judicial question, to be determined solely from the evidence. What had the success of the Democratic party of Indiana to do with such a question?

What are the privileges of the House? One of the most important privileges of the House undoubtedly is the immunity of its members from all influences that would warp their deliberations. The members of the House discuss the matters that come before it, not only publicly as in open debate, but also in conversation among themselves. Exemptions from external influence is intended to be secured by excluding others than members from the floor of the House. Is it not clear that the entrance of a stranger, admitted not of right but by courtesy, who for days and weeks is actively engaged in lobbying, is a clear violation of this privilege?

It is also the duty of the House to protect itself from scandal. Its integrity, honor, and good fame should be held to be sacred. Can it be so regarded and esteemed when that universal servitor and censor, the press of the country, publishes broadcast the news that lobbying is carried on openly on its floor and during its deliberations?

In view of the foregoing the undersigned submit the following resolution and recommend its passage:

Resolved, That the conduct of Hon. William H. English upon the floor of the House while the contested-election case of English vs. Peelle was under consideration, as shown by the evidence taken before the select committee appointed to investigate the same, was improper and a violation of the privileges thereof, and that he be excluded therefrom during the present Congress.

STEPHEN C. MILLARD.
THOS. M. BAYNE.
J. B. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. HAMMOND. I would like to know from the gentlemen of the minority whether they consider it desirable to debate the issues between the members of the committee; and, if so, for what length of time?

Mr. MILLARD. I would suggest that thirty or forty minutes be allowed to each side.

Mr. BAYNE. Thirty minutes are enough.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will then retain the floor and yield half of the hour to the other side, reserving the other half, that gentlemen on our side who desire to speak may occupy such portion of that time as they may desire. At the end of that time I will make my motion to lay the whole matter on the table. Do gentlemen on the other side desire to speak now in favor of their resolution?

Mr. MILLARD. I do not care which side shall be heard first.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then proceed, if you please.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, that we may understand at the outset of this discussion the precise question under consideration, I desire to call the attention of the House to the facts and circumstances out of which this whole matter arose. While the contested-election case of English vs. Peelle was under consideration the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] rose in his seat and made the following statement:

Mr. Speaker, under the rules of this House no ex-member of Congress has the right to the floor of the House if he abuses the privileges by attempting to influence legislation while here on the floor. I now desire to say that it has been brought to my notice, and that by a Democratic member of this House, that an ex-member of Congress, who is the father of one of the contestants in this case, has been on the floor of the House for days soliciting members, sending for them, taking them into consultation, and attempting to influence their votes upon this case. If that be true, it is such a violation of the dignity and integrity of this House that it ought not to go unnoticed. I assert such to be the fact.

The charge of the distinguished member was specific both as to the person accused and the character of the offense charged. The person referred to was the Hon. William H. English, of Indiana, and the offense charged was lobbying in the interest of the contestant while the case was under actual consideration by this House.

The statement of the gentleman from Michigan occasioned not a little excitement upon this floor and was met by an emphatic denial from many members upon the other side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, obtaining the floor, replied to Mr. HORR in the following manner, and I desire to use his precise words:

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, the father of the contestant would be unnatural if he did not take the deepest interest in his son's contest. I stand here a witness to the fact that that gentleman has exercised the most careful propriety in connection with this case.

It is very evident that the distinguished member and ex-Speaker from Pennsylvania had not been a witness to the extraordinary conduct of the ex-member from Indiana or he would not have made the statement he did on that occasion, for I do not believe he would intentionally and deliberately countenance so flagrant an infraction of the privileges of this House, even though the guilty person be none other than the late candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the great Democratic party.

After some considerable discussion pro and con the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker, and it is hereby instructed to inquire and report to the House whether or not the Hon. William H. English, an ex-member of this House, has violated the privileges thereof in the contested-election case of English vs. Peelle. The said committee shall inquire and report whether any ex-member of the House, employed as agent or attorney in any contested-election case here pending, or for any railroad or other corporation, or of persons having any claim pending here, has during this session abused the privileges allowed him under the thirty-fourth rule of the House, and report, if any, who they are, and how they have abused said privileges of the House.

In pursuance of this resolution a committee was appointed, consisting of seven members—four Democratic and three Republican members of the House.

The committee at once entered upon the investigation, several witnesses have been called and sworn, including Hon. William H. English himself, and the evidence has been printed and is before the House. As a member of that committee and familiar with the evidence, I want to say that in my humble judgment the charge of the distinguished member from Michigan has been sustained; that Hon. William H. English, out of his own mouth and by his own admissions, stands convicted of the grossest improprieties and violations of the privileges of this House, and I challenge any fair-minded person, I care not to what political party he belongs, to read the evidence taken before the investigating committee and arrive at any other conclusion.

This, as I have stated, is not a question whether he violated Rule XXXIV, but whether or not he has not violated the privileges of the House. Rule XXXIV only permitted him to come upon the floor of the House, but after once upon the floor it did not permit him to engage in lobbying members to vote for his son. What I complain of is not his being upon the floor at such a time, though in my judgment it was an exhibition of very bad taste in the distinguished gentleman, but his conduct after once upon the floor. Sir, the evidence of Judge MOULTON, of Illinois, Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, Hon. ORLANDO B. POTTER, of New York—all these gentlemen of the same political faith as himself—shows that his conduct was not only improper and indecent in any light you may view it, a flagrant violation of the rights and privileges of this legislative body, but an insult to the honor and integrity of every member he approached.

It is uncontroverted that he came to this city on the 1st day of May last, and from the time he landed in Washington down to the eve of his departure, which was within three hours after his son had been seated, there was scarcely an hour that he was not engaged in lobbying in the interest of the contestant on and off the floor of the House. Before the Committee on Elections had reported, and while the subcommittee had the case under consideration, we find him at their rooms importuning them to report in favor of the contestant, and he comes upon the floor and procures members of the House to labor with the subcommittee that they may make a favorable report.

There is not a Democratic member of this committee of elections with whom he says he did not talk concerning the case either at their respective places of abode in Washington or upon the floor of the House, and yet this man says he saw no impropriety in it. Did he ask and demand that his son be seated upon the ground that he had been honestly and fairly elected? Oh, no! He claimed that while he was in Congress the party always stood together upon such questions, and that by putting his son in Mr. Peelle's seat the great Democratic party of Indiana would be benefited. May the good Lord deal tenderly with the Democratic party in Indiana if it can only achieve success through such foul means!

Mr. COOK of Iowa, one of the subcommittee of elections, and one of the subcommittee having the case under consideration and advisement (COOK was a Greenbacker, elected on that issue), was told before the report was made that it was for the interest of the Greenback party in Indiana that his (English's) son should be seated. Sir, permit me to call the attention of this House to a small portion of the evidence of Hon. William H. English before the investigating committee:

Q. Did you discuss the effect it would have if Mr. Peelle were allowed his seat?
A. I think it was spoken of with a view to its political effect.
Q. Did you talk to anybody else, state to anybody else, the effect it would have in Indiana if your son were ousted?
A. I did.
Q. To whom?
A. To every member with whom I talked; we made no concealment of what we thought about it.
Q. What did you represent the effect would be?
A. I said to my political friends, those who asked me about it, that I thought it highly desirable for the party to stand together upon the question; that that was the policy in Congress when I was there, and that they ought not to divide upon this election case. I said the effect would be injurious to the party in the country.

Sir, what had the Democratic party of Indiana or the whole country to do with this question, a judicial question to be decided upon its merits. I know of no claim or right more sacred or inviolate than the right to a seat upon this floor. It was a question that not only concerned Stanton J. Peelle, but 150,000 citizens of his district. The logic of the argument of the distinguished ex-member was that to benefit the party to which he belonged he was justified in robbing Mr. Peelle of his seat upon this floor.

Some one during the discussion, and about the time the vote was to be taken, told him that Judge MOULTON, of Illinois, was going to vote for Mr. Peelle. He at once went to the seat of the judge and requested him not to vote at all if he could not vote for his son. The judge replied, "I have examined the evidence, and in my judgment your son was not elected and is not entitled to the seat." Whereupon English replied that since he had not made any record on the case he could step out while the vote was being taken; that they had had a good deal of trouble in Indiana, and it was everything to them that his son should be seated; and yet this distinguished gentleman and ex-member saw no impropriety in all this.

It will be remembered that one of the distinct charges of the member from Michigan was that while the case was actually under consideration by this House he had sent for members and taken them into consultation in reference to this case and with the view of influencing their action in respect thereto. Hon. ORLANDO B. POTTER, of New York, and a Democrat, testified before the subcommittee that while he was in his seat, and while the case was under consideration, he received a note from Mr. English to come to the cloak-room on the Democratic side of the House; that he complied with the request; that in the cloak-room he found English and Senator VOORHEES, of Indiana, another distinguished Democrat; that English there told him that he had heard that his [POTTER'S] opinion was against the right of his son to the seat. POTTER told him that what he had heard was true; that he had carefully examined the case and he did not think his son was elected, but that Mr. Peelle was. He also told him that he [POTTER] intended to speak for Mr. Peelle. Mr. English requested him not to fight them on the floor; that he should not speak; that the Senator joined in this request, and out of deference to their joint request he did refrain from speaking.

Yet this distinguished ex-member, for eight years a member of this House, familiar with its rules and privileges, told the investigating committee that he saw no impropriety in it. Sir, I am not surprised that Mr. Potter upon his return from that interview should say to Mr. HORR that this sort of business was an outrage. Knowing him to be a high-minded gentleman, honorable and strictly conscientious in all his transactions, I would not have been surprised if he had ordered this man from the floor of the House.

But the evidence of Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, is not less damaging than that of Mr. POTTER. Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, and he is a Democrat, testified that after he had voted upon the first proposition, English came down to his seat and asked him if he was going to stand by and see a Democrat slaughtered. He replied to him that if it were at the polls he would vote for his son, but he had examined the case, and he was satisfied that his son was not entitled to the seat. Whereupon English replied, "All right; time will make us all even." Such, sir, is the character of the evidence against this man and his conduct during the consideration of this case.

With all due respect to the gentlemen who have joined in the majority report, I protest against it. It is a violation of the evidence, and the evidence does not justify its conclusions. I care not whether the accused be a Democrat or Republican, such extraordinary conduct during the consideration of a measure affecting the right to a seat in this House ought not to be tolerated. By the adoption of such a report we say to the country that this sort of thing is right and proper.

Sir, I protest against it. Whether English or Peelle was entitled to the seat was not a political but a judicial question, to be determined from the evidence, and no man knew this better than Hon. William H. English himself. If it was right or proper for him to come upon this floor at such a time and seek to influence the votes of any of the members of this House, it is right and proper for him or any person to enter the jury-room after the cause has been tried, the evidence closed, and the jury sent out under the charge of the court to find according to the law and the evidence. Sir, there is not a lawyer upon this floor who does not know that such an interference with the deliberations of a jury would invalidate any verdict they might render.

If it is proper or decent for this man to appear here at such a time and seek directly or indirectly to swerve any of the members of this House from a faithful performance of their duty, it is right and proper for any litigant or his father to approach the highest judicial tribunal in the land after the cause has been fully heard and submitted. What court or judicial tribunal in this or any other civilized country would tolerate such an interference?

Sir, had Hon. William H. English remained at home during the consideration of this case Stanton J. Peelle would not have been deprived of his seat upon this floor. Mr. Peelle had been honestly and fairly elected. So thought the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Elections, and he is also a Democrat. Such was the deliberate judgment of thirty-one Democrats upon the other side of this House as expressed by their votes. But I will not longer weary the patience of the House. The question, sir, is an important one; it affects the honor and integrity of every member upon this floor. We can not by any action we may take here to-day undo the wrong and injustice done Mr. Peelle in taking from him a seat to which he was clearly entitled. That remains for the people of his district. They will see to that. The people of Indiana believe in equal rights and fair play.

I had the honor to occupy a seat in the immediate vicinity of that of Mr. Peelle, and I want to say that a truer gentleman or a more conscientious Representative I have never known; but though we may not have it in our power to place him back in his seat, we can by promptly passing the resolution submitted by the minority of the committee place the seal of our condemnation upon the fraudulent means by which he was deprived of his rights and the people of his district wholly disfranchised.

Mr. BAYNE. I suppose this debate should be alternated somewhat. Before I proceed I should like to hear one of the gentlemen on the other side. [Cries of "Go ahead!" and "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HAMMOND. I thought the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] desired to speak.

Mr. BAYNE. He is now in his seat.

Mr. HAMMOND (after a pause). I believe he does not desire to speak now.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to have the Chair inform me when I have consumed ten minutes.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been a fairer way of disposing of this case if some of the arguments upon the other side had been first presented. But gentlemen on that side seem disposed to withhold any remarks until we shall have concluded ours. They reserve the closing speech, which all lawyers know to be a very decided advantage. If it were not for the supreme strength of our case I should insist that something be first said on the other side. But when the House of Representatives is confronted with the state of facts presented by this evidence argument either one way or the other can not swerve the House from a correct conclusion, if conscience is to be the guide in the casting of the vote.

What have we here? We have the House of Representatives organized under strict rules, which exclude from the floor everybody except the necessary officers of the House and a few privileged persons. The latter are admitted by courtesy. Why? Because they are presumed to be above reproach. It is supposed that in coming upon the floor they will do nothing unbecoming a gentleman and a man of honor in the presence to which they are admitted by this courtesy.

What was the conduct of Mr. William H. English? The contested-election case of Peelle vs. English was pending before the Committee on Elections. Before that committee had reported Mr. English came to Washington. He went to every Democratic member of the committee and importuned him to vote in favor of seating his son. He came upon the floor of the House and importuned on the floor every Democratic member whose attitude was in the least doubtful to vote in favor of seating his son. He learned that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Elections [Mr. CONVERSE], my honored friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON], and various other gentlemen on this floor had consciences which they proposed to assert. He approached them; he did everything that lay in his power to persuade them either not to vote at all or to vote for his son. What arguments did he use? Why, sir, he said that to refuse the seat to his son would ruin the Democratic party all over the country; that the party had a hard fight out in Indiana. "Are you," he said in substance, "going to slaughter a Democrat in this way?" He made the strongest partisan appeals to Democratic members of this House to seat his son and unseat Mr. Peelle. He went to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], who was to deliver a speech in favor of Mr. Peelle, and having failed to prevail on him not to vote in behalf of Mr. Peelle, he did prevail on him not to make the speech he had intended to deliver.

He secured pairs in the Committee on Elections. He even went so far as to draw into this case the wives of gentlemen of high standing, resorting to every device that could be known to a politician to secure the end he had in view. Time after time he visited the members of the Committee on Elections at their homes. Time after time he came to them on the floor of the House. Time after time he went to members on the Democratic side of the House and importuned them in every way that lay in his power. He did his best to persuade the Democratic members of this House to vote for his son on the ground that to vote otherwise would ruin the Democratic party, on the ground that the Democratic party had no right to slaughter one of its sons. And he wound up all this action with the menace, addressed to a Democratic member, that "time would make all things even," or something to that effect.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir; you refused to speak and let me hear what you had to say. He said that "time would make all things even," thus intimating that his great purse should be used to visit punishment upon those Democrats who failed to come up to the mark and do their partisan duty in this matter.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BAYNE. I have not the time.

Mr. WELLER. My name is involved in this matter; and do you deny me the privilege of a question at this time?

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I claim the floor.

Now, sir, this House is confronted by the state of facts I have recited; and the vote on this question will indicate the political ethics that regulate the conduct of members.

What rule was violated? No express rule, I believe, according to the construction which has been put upon the rule by Mr. Speaker CARLISLE, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], by Mr. Garfield, I am told, and by others. These gentlemen, it is understood, have held that Rule XXXIV applies only to cases where the person admitted to the floor advocates a matter in which he has a pecuniary interest. I leave Rule XXXIV entirely out of this case. But there is a rule of parliamentary law which applies to this case, and which is as well known as Rule XXXIV can be. What is that rule? That the House of Representatives, while deliberating, while acting, should be free from all external influences, and that no man should come upon the floor of the House of Representatives and undertake to participate in the deliberations of that body unless he is a member of it. Let me read the definition of this power; this rule which rises in magnitude and in dignity way above Rule XXXIV, and includes it and a multitude of great principles not involved in Rule XXXIV.

That these privileges must be continually progressive, seems to result from their rejecting all definition of them; the doctrine being that "their dignity and independence are preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite, and that

'the maxims upon which they proceed, together with the method of proceeding, rest entirely in their own breast, and are not defined and ascertained by any particular stated laws.'" (1 Blackst., 163, 164; Jefferson's Manual.)

That is the principle under which this man has violated the courtesy of this House. It is the idea of self-preservation, of the dignity, of the honor, of the uprightness of the proceedings of this body; and so jealous is the principle of a possible infringement of that dignity——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. YOUNG in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. But a moment longer to finish the sentence. But so jealous is the principle of a possible infringement of that dignity that it says the manner of conducting these proceedings is lodged in the breast of its members, and whether it may be written law, there is an unwritten law which finds every member here to regard any such conduct as that of William H. English as a clear, palpable, and manifest violation of the privileges of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. I now yield what remains of the time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. I will go on now if the other side does not wish to be heard; otherwise I shall prefer to hear them first.

Mr. HAMMOND. Does the gentleman from Arkansas wish to speak now?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have no objection if it be considered desirable by the other side.

Mr. HORR. Very well, then; I will reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I did not care to follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD], because he had stated but one thing, and that was a question of fact, that seemed to require a response of any sort. He states that when this charge was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] that it was denied and positively denied by this side of the House. I challenge the record for the truth of that statement.

Mr. MILLARD. Repeat what Mr. RANDALL said.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. RANDALL never denied the statement of Mr. HORR, but what he did say was that he stood "as a witness to the fact that that gentleman [Mr. English] has exercised the most careful propriety in connection with this case." Sir, it is a most serious mistake, and it is a mistake which the gentleman who was on the subcommittee on this investigation ought not to make, after having read this record over and over and over again before the subcommittee. I state on the contrary with truth that there is not a single solitary denial on this side of the House of the charge made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] so far as to the fact that Mr. English interested himself in behalf of his son by talking to members on this side. Not only was that admitted in debate, but it was admitted in committee and was admitted by Mr. English himself, as was stated by the gentleman from Michigan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I might stop at this point to discuss the question as to whether or not, if you admit every statement made by Mr. HORR to be true, it is a violation of any rule of parliamentary law on this subject. I say it is not, and if gentlemen have authority to the contrary let them produce it. But there is one thing I desire to speak about in connection with Mr. HORR'S testimony. Sir, if we are to enter in this discussion upon the wide domain of ethics or good taste or propriety on this floor, there are many things to investigate in the course of this proceeding which ought to merit the attention of this House. In the course of that debate Mr. HORR made use of this language:

Q. Mr. BAYNE said that he got the information from you in the first instance and Mr. KASSON in the second.

A. He could not have gotten it from me in the first instance, because I did not know anything except what those gentlemen told me right there. I did not incorporate it in my remarks, because I did not think it was definite enough. I purposely left it out.

Q. In addition to what you have stated in the record and to which I have called your attention heretofore, you said, "Now, if you do not believe what I tell you"—you were then addressing the House—"then investigate the matter, and I promise to prove more than I have stated, and prove it to your satisfaction," Now, in support of that allegation, have you anything further to submit to the committee?

A. Nothing more than to say that at least six or seven members on your side of the House——

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The Democratic side of the House?

A. On the Democratic side of the House. They stated to me that the thing was notorious, and that it ought to be stopped.

By Mr. HENLEY:

Q. You have given us the name of Mr. ELLIS.

A. I can not tell who it was; it was in a casual talk. I have given the names of three members who spoke to me about the case; but I do not think I stated before that I could give the name of any one who gave me specific information upon that point.

Q. What did those three members accuse Mr. English of; state it specifically; boil it down as nearly as you can to the exact language?

A. That he was on the floor log-rolling the case for his son.

Q. That is what you referred to in the first portion of your remarks, to which I have called your attention?

A. It is.

Q. What is there in addition to what you stated on the floor that you can furnish us information about?

Mr. MILLARD. That is an intimation that he meant something more than his individual statement.

The WITNESS. Oh, no; what I meant by that was that there would be more men to corroborate me, so that the House would be perfectly satisfied. I know that for a day or two it was quite common talk around the House.

Nothing more to prove, Mr. Speaker; no more facts to bring before the House, but simply more witnesses to prove what he had said; that after this dark hint that there was something back of all of this proceeding that could be brought forward to indicate corruption with reference to this gentleman that he had alleged on the floor of the House.

Now, sir, with these remarks in reference to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD], who submits the report of the minority, I have nothing more to say about what he has stated in this connection, and turn my attention to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], who has just addressed the House, but whom I do not now see in his seat. I have shown by the record of the testimony to which I have referred, and nobody will have the hardihood to deny it who takes the trouble to read the record, that the gentleman from New York was mistaken in the statement he made on the floor of this House as well as in his report, and I sought the floor during the progress of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to correct him in a misstatement to which I desired to call his attention with reference to a member of this House. It will be remembered that the gentleman denied me that privilege. He had stated, as the RECORD will show, in substance that Mr. English, the father of the contestant, had made a threat against Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, holding a threat and a menace over him in a conversation they had together upon the floor. Sir, I appealed to the gentleman from Arkansas, my colleague here who sits on my left, whether that statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was true or false. He informs me that it is not true; and so the first two parties upon that side who have rushed into the lists to break a lance find themselves falsified by the records.

But, sir, that is not the first offense committed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this direction. Mr. Speaker, there is a gentleman representing a district in the great State of Iowa, who sits upon this floor, and the testimony taken in this case develops the fact that he is a man of integrity and high character at his own home. It develops this further fact that he is the father of a family; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the presence of this body rose in his seat and stigmatized the gentleman from Iowa with reference to his alleged connection with facts that have turned out to be utterly groundless and without foundation when attempted to be supported by testimony. But the gentleman consumes his time in attacking Mr. English instead of making an honest, fair, and manly disclaimer of this offensive charge against the gentleman from Iowa.

Sir, I state here plainly, boldly, and openly on this floor that this declination on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania involves a greater degree of moral turpitude than anything and everything disclosed by the testimony in this case against the father of the contestant from Indiana or anybody else. And yet, sir, he consumed the time of the House allotted to him in this debate by attacking Mr. English for his connection with the contest of his son without attempting to make a proper disclamer or withdrawal of the offensive insinuation or charge used toward the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] or Mr. English.

In vindication of the gentleman from Iowa, I wish to state here now as the sense of the subcommittee which investigated this matter, and as shown by the evidence submitted to the House, that he is wholly exonerated from anything improper in connection with the whole transaction.

Mr. WELLER. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania refused me opportunity to bring this matter to the attention of the House when he made his remarks, and I sought the floor for that purpose. He would not yield me a moment.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is perfectly satisfied, it seems, to make an attack upon gentlemen—an attack unwarranted by the testimony and not established by the proof against Mr. English and Mr. WELLER, and yet is perfectly willing and satisfied to leave these gentlemen under the cloud of condemnation and obloquy he sought to cast upon them, and seems content himself to remain under the cloud with them by his declination and refusal to withdraw the offensive assertions made by him against them.

Now, sir, I have but brief time to occupy in this debate. I want to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments as to the animus of this transaction.

Sir, these gentlemen could find it in their hearts to come here and make an attack and direct their assaults against a man in this case whom the law and the facts show to be guilty of nothing whatever. If there is anything at all in the character of the transaction it is a mere question of propriety or of ethics. It is no infringement upon the privileges of the House; and yet they come here with a garbled report, so badly garbled in the light of the testimony taken by the committee as to make it practically indeed a false report upon its face, false in part, and false as a whole, because it is a garbled report, not justified by a fair construction of the evidence.

Sir, what is the animus of these parties? If they desired to reach somebody for a violation of the rules of the House why did they not take up Green B. Raum. He stands here an ex-member of Congress, a Republican ex-member of Congress; and he admits broadly he was employed in cases pending before Congress and that he was on the floor of this House repeatedly during this session.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR rose.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I merely desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The gentleman will excuse me. I say Green B. Raum admits himself that not only was he on the floor, but that he talked to members of this body on the whisky bill during the time it was pending before Congress. Another witness—and he is a Republican witness, Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky—says Raum was here when the debate was going on in consultation with another member on the floor of the House; and he was likewise here, as I recollect the evidence now, when the vote was being taken.

Why do not these gentlemen, if they desire to find somebody to condemn, somebody to asperse—why do they not condemn a man who is a self-confessed violator not only of the general parliamentary law but of the thirty-fourth rule of this House. He says he was employed by the whisky association, received money from them, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, and the proof shows he was on this floor pending the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. YOUNG). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I should like one moment more.

Mr. HAMMOND. I yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The distinction between Mr. English and Mr. Raum was this: Mr. English was here in the relation of a father to a son, not employed as a counsel or agent, nor pecuniarily interested in his son's contest; and it is not contended he had any other relation than that of a friendly interest. But Green B. Raum was the hired counsel of the whisky association, and fell directly under the provisions of this rule.

Sir, I state in conclusion that in the Forty-second Congress—and I will cite gentlemen to the RECORD, if they desire it—Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, said in discussing this rule the meaning of the word "interest" was that it was a pecuniary interest. Raum fell within the provisions of the rule directly. English was neither an agent nor a hired counsel, and testified he had no interest direct or indirect, pecuniarily, in the results of this contest, and hence he did not fall under the rule. If the whole animus had not been to make political capital out of a man whose shoe-latchets they are unworthy to loose, why did they not select Raum?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Do the majority say anything in their report about Green B. Raum?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The majority state in plain language that he violated the rules of the House, and the testimony shows it. And I go one step further, and say he is the only man who appears here and flagrantly violates the rules of the House by being on the floor pending the consideration of the bill and during the period when the vote was being taken. When we asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] for his information, when he spoke of parties who were lobbying for the whisky association, he said that Green B. Raum went out at one door and another gentleman at the same time went out at another, and remarked in passing, "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." My time is up and I yield the floor, with thanks to my friend from Georgia for the extension of time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAMMOND. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY].

Mr. HENLEY. It is altogether expedient for this House, in the first place, to make a brief inquiry and ascertain with accuracy the specific charge that inspired this investigation; and I suppose I may safely refer to the gentleman who offered the resolution as an interpreter of the purposes for which he offered it. And I want to see whether or not the resonant and vaunting declaration which was made on the other side of this House, that they would not only prove everything which had been intimated on this floor but a great deal more—I want to see how that has been fulfilled by the testimony that has been taken by this committee.

What, sir, was the specific charge upon which the resolution was predicated? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] himself says that it was because information had been conveyed to him or because he himself knew that Mr. English, sr., had taken the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] to the cloak-room, or to some secret place, and had there subjected him to improper influences, and had changed the course of the gentleman from Iowa from that which he had been previously following in this case. That, sir, was the charge which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made on this floor. When he was interrogated before the committee as to who it was he referred to, in order that there might be no mistake in this matter, he said he meant Mr. WELLER, of Iowa. How has that charge been made good? I ask Representatives upon this floor to note how that has been sustained. There was no pretense of any question of propriety or moral ethics or mere decorum on the part of Mr. English or as to the cut of his coat or the color of his cravat. The charge was that he had taken a member on this floor off to some place and there subjected him to some sinister influence which had operated on that member's conduct in voting on this case.

Now, sir, what is the result of it? We called General BAYNE—and I speak of him now by name, because I am dealing with him as a witnesss and not as a member of this House. We called him before the committee and said: "General, you said so and so; that Mr. English did so and so with Mr. WELLER. Where is your proof? How do you know it?" "Oh," he said, holding up his hands, "I have no personal knowledge of it." "Who told you so?" "Mr. HORR, of Michigan, told me so." Then the committee called Mr. HORR. "Mr. HORR, did you say so and so to Mr. BAYNE?" "Oh, no," says the gentleman from Michigan, "I know nothing personally at all about it; I got my information from Mr. KASSON and Mr. BAYNE." We then called Mr. KASSON. "Mr. KASSON, what do you know about it?" Mr. KASSON said, "I do not know anything about it; I got my information from Mr. BAYNE and Mr. HORR."

And so they go on round and round in a circle. We would call one, and he would put it off on another; and we would call that other, and he would put it off on the one just called. And so when you come to sift this thing down to the bottom it appears that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in a spirit—I can attribute it to nothing else—of the blindest and most vindictive partisanship, without making any inquiry at all as to the verity of the information which he had received, and without apparently thinking it worth while to make any inquiry, rises in his place on the floor of this House and with due solemnity offers a resolution the effect of which will be, as I fear, notwithstanding this resolution of exoneration, to fix an everlasting stigma upon the reputation and fame of Mr. WELLER, although the proof in this case shows and gentlemen of the other side on the committee have admitted that so far as this charge is concerned he stands here as pure and as innocent as the child unborn.

Yet we have here the extraordinary spectacle of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] when he has an opportunity to exonerate and vindicate and acquit the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] sitting here with sealed lips, knowing as he does that there is not a scintilla of proof in this case in support of the allegation which he so solemnly made on this floor.

It is admitted that Mr. English did not subject the gentleman from Iowa to that interview. It is admitted that Mr. English did not violate Rule XXXIV. And now we come down to the question of ethics and of propriety. Why, it is urged that was indelicate in Mr. English to do this and that and to urge his son's cause on this floor. Probably it might be. But I am reminded of a speech of the great Irish orator, Mr. Curran, before a jury, when upon a certain occasion, speaking of the conduct of his client which had been criticised, he said: "Why, you expect my client, when all the fiends of hell are tugging at his heart-strings, to stand before a mirror and bid the streams of agony to flow decorously down his cheeks."

The senior English, knowing his son to have been villainously—I was going to say euchred out of his election in Indiana [laughter], came here to Washington and came upon the floor of this House. What does he see? He sees a Republican Senator of the United States coming upon the floor of the House soliciting, importuning—he sees all that kind of thing going on.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HENLEY. Of course I will allow you.

Mr. MILLARD. Is there a particle of evidence in this case——

Mr. HENLEY. I am not talking about the evidence in this case. I am talking about what the gentleman himself and every observant gentleman upon this floor saw; that is what I am speaking about.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman as a lawyer——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENLEY. My time is up. I say in conclusion that the senior English, seeing what was going on upon the Republican side, is not to be criticised in probably overstepping the limits of strict decorum and delicacy of demeanor. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] will now occupy the time to which he is entitled.

Mr. HORR. The charge which I made on a former occasion is explicit:

> I now rise and say that it has been brought to my notice by a Democratic member of this House that an ex-member of Congress, who is the father of one of the litigants in this case, has been on the floor of the House soliciting members, sending for them, taking them into consultation, and attempting to influence them in their votes on this case.

If that be true, then it was such a violation of the dignity and integrity of this House that it ought not to go unnoticed. The question now before us is, has that charge been sustained?

If you will look at the testimony of Mr. POTTER, of New York—and nobody denies that he is a Democrat—you will see that he swears that he told me that Mr. English was doing exactly that thing, and that it was an outrage and ought to be stopped. Now that is proof enough on that point, is it not? He is corroborated by Mr. MOULTON, of Illinois, by Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, by Mr. ELLIS, of Louisiana, and by Mr. English himself; for Mr. English, if you will read his testimony, testifies that day in and day out he went about the House importuning members, begging of them to vote for his son, and warning them that they were injuring the Democratic party if they did not stick together without regard to their convictions and vote to oust Mr. Peelle.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. English never said anything of that sort.

Mr. HORR. Read the testimony.

Mr. HENLEY. He never said anything of the sort.

Mr. HORR. Now the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROGERS] says——

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. From Arkansas.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I apologize also to Kentucky. [Laughter.] The gentleman stated that they on that side of the House did not deny my charge at the time. You stated just now, my friend from Arkansas, did you not, that nobody denied on your side of the House the charge that I made?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I challenged the record. I gave my reading of it. Now show the contrary if you can.

Mr. HORR. I thought at the time nobody had denied it; and I stated in these words that you had not one of you denied it:

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, to my surprise, that since I have called the attention of the House to this matter, among all the speakers on that side of the House not a single one has risen in his seat and denied a single charge that has been made in this case.

Whereupon Mr. COSGROVE, of Missouri, who is a Democrat, is he not? Where is Brother COSGROVE?

Several MEMBERS. He is a Democrat.

Mr. HORR. Mr. COSGROVE said:

It is all denied.

So much for that.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] soon after said:

There is no admission on this side of the House of that sort.

Is Brother RANDALL a Democrat? I know you read him out of the party not long ago, but he is back now, is he not? [Laughter.] Now, you did deny it. The proof is overwhelming that exactly what I stated was true, and the question is whether that is a violation of the dignity of this House. An election case goes to the very existence of this body——

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, one moment——

Mr. HORR. My time is so limited——

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Just one moment. I desire to say, in justice to myself and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD], that I had not noticed the expression of Mr. COSGROVE.

Mr. HORR. You did not notice it?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. No, sir; I did not observe it.

Mr. HORR. Very well; that is satisfactory to me; I accept your correction—of yourself, I mean.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the real question here is whether that kind of conduct is proper. Is there a Democrat here who thinks it right when we are trying the question whether a man is entitled to a seat on this floor, and the proof becomes so convincing as it did to the able chairman of this committee that he can not vote to seat a Democratic contestant—is it right because the contestant has a father who was once a member of the House, more than that, a father who has once held before the American people a still more distinguished political position—is it proper for that man to come upon the floor of this House, to go from member to member and tell them—what? That his son was elected? No. That his son under the law ought to be seated? No; because my friend from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON], a better lawyer than Mr. English, told him, "I have examined this case, and I am satisfied that your son was not elected." Then Mr. English replies, "Well, you have not voted yet. Now, just leave the Hall and don't make any record at all." What for? For the benefit of the Democratic party? Then he struck Brother COOK; and his solicitude then was for the benefit of the Greenback party. [Laughter.] Then he struck Brother PEEL, of Arkansas, and his concern was for the interest of Mr. PEEL, because, as he said, "Time will make all things even." That was a way of saying, "You vote against my boy, and I, the ex-candidate for Vice-President on the Democratic ticket, will hunt you out before you get much older. That is what it meant. Come now, my Democratic friends, is that what you call sustaining the dignity of the American Congress? Is such conduct proper? Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, in all candor—I can not go into the testimony, but any man reading it will come to this conclusion—that this man did what no sensitive man having a true sense of the honor and dignity of the American Congress could do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAMMOND. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a great deal more time and attention have been bestowed on this subject than its real and intrinsic merits warrant. In my view the propriety of the conduct of Mr. English as an ex-member of this House in coming upon this floor and his action while here is to be judged of entirely by reference to the rules of the House. I am willing to admit for myself that I have always indulged the belief that the present rule, as well as the rule which preceded it, and indeed any rule admitting upon this floor other persons than members themselves—the men responsible for legislation—together with the necessary officers or employés of the House, and perhaps heads of Departments, is not dictated by wisdom.

I have always entertained that view, and I do still; but the rule of the House is otherwise, and that rule of the House must be appealed to in determining the propriety of the conduct of any gentleman coming upon the floor. And that rule is very brief. A gentleman having been a member of the House is entitled to the privileges of the floor if he has no interest in any claim pending in Congress and is not directly interested in any pending bill. It has not been pretended by any member that Mr. English had any interest in any claim pending within the meaning of the rule, or that he had any direct or indirect interest in any bill pending before Congress. That is clear beyond all question; and being admitted to the floor of the House under the rule, in the absence of any such interest the only question that remains, therefore, is whether or not conversing with members of the House touching a measure affecting his son was an abuse of the privilege of the House extended to an ex-member. I think a sense of justice in every member of the House must force him to the conclusion that if Mr. English was rightfully admitted to the floor, his conversing with members on a subject not included in the rule was not a breach of the privileges of the House. There was no violation of the rule, and the rule is the law of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish merely to say in addition that the very important fact which was established before the committee, that Mr. English consulted with the Speaker of this House, a gentleman honored by both sides of this House for his moderation, impartiality, and fairness, as to the propriety of his presence on this floor during the pendency of the election contest, and was informed by the Speaker that it was not improper, ought to be conclusive of this controversy.

Mr. REED. I suggest the gentleman from Indiana should be amenable to the rules of the House he admires so much.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield me one minute longer.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have only six minutes remaining.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly what to say. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD] has said that no man of sense could differ with him in this matter, and I am not willing to admit that I am a fool. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] has said that no honest man can differ from him, and I never was charged with dishonesty until I drew a seat on the Republican side of the House. [Laughter.]

I desire to look at this thing plainly. I do not know Mr. English or care anything about the case personally. I know nothing in this case but the law. A resolution is offered that the conduct of Mr. English on the floor of the House was "improper and a breach of the privileges of the House." The committee was not raised to pass upon a question of propriety. The question is whether his conduct was a breach of privilege. Gentlemen were asked before this report was written to cite in all the history of all the parliaments of the earth any precedent that quiet efforts at persuasion to vote on a particular case, without corruption, had ever been held to be a breach of parliament, and they were silent.

The resolution we are asked to adopt is that his conduct on the floor was a breach of privilege, and gentlemen tell you what his conduct was. They have descended—and I say it as respectfully as an honest man ought to—they have descended to invade the privacy of a family. And because Mr. English admitted that he had called upon a member of the House at his home, and, finding him away, had spoken to his wife and asked her to aid him in getting his son seated, therefore they urge that we shall, because of his conduct "on the floor," say that he committed a breach of the privileges of this House. That is the argument they make and that is all they can make.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] also alluded to the fact Mr. English is a man of distinguished political position. He was elected——

Mr. REED. Oh, no; you mean the other man.

Mr. HAMMOND. But never got it. That is the real secret of the whole trouble.

Several MEMBERS. You mean Hendricks?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; the truth is, I am so full of that great political wrong I blundered.

Mr. REED. You are not only full, but boiling over.

Mr. HAMMOND. The truth is simply this: There was an effort made (and that is all there is in the case) to blacken the reputation of a man because he was a distinguished Democrat. These gentlemen come here and with lofty words talk about the dignity of the House, the unbounded dignity, and the gross outrage, and say let us punish this grand culprit. How? By voting that he shall not come upon this floor next winter. The very limit of their proposed punishment shows how little they thought of law and logic. If it be true that this distinguished man has violated the privileges of this House as charged, an honest man would take away from him the right ever again to put his foot within its sacred precincts.

Mr. MILLARD. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. I can not.

I characterize it, therefore, as a terrible strain to bring out a conclusion; as a struggle of the Republican mountain, and not even the birth of a mouse. The testimony in this case shows that Mr. English used the ordinary means, as he swears, of persuasion, like a man electioneering for office. He says he used personal influence with this man and that man and the other.

The charge as originally brought, and by innuendo insisted upon, was that there had been direct corruption of a member of this House. That is all. Nobody now pretends that it is true. Nobody pretends that there is anything like truth in it; but they come now and simply say as a matter of taste he ought not to have been here electioneering for his son.

I now move to lay the whole matter upon the table.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. I read from my remarks on this floor the day after the resolution was presented to the consideration of the House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. I then said:

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have had occasion to discredit the judgment of the gentleman [Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana] in the matter of his views and opinions. [Laughter and applause.] I stated to the member who particularly importuned me and assured me of the glory I could win that his appeal came too late, for I had already voted. [Laughter.]

I would most certainly myself, Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up for consideration on yesterday have spoken and voted for an investigation by a committee of all improper acts on the part of any one on this floor in the premises of a question of the high importance of a rightful seat as a member of this House.

I am informed by reading the record of yesterday's proceedings that a committee for the investigation of this whole matter has been appointed. I am glad that this has been done, and I trust that it will do its work immediately and perform its duty in this matter most thoroughly. I am not slow to perceive that there may be a deep underlying purpose in the bringing of my name into this business. My continuous presence here on this floor during the hours of session of this House, and my persistent objections to measures that were repeatedly presented for consideration, has doubtless rendered me very objectionable and obnoxious to certain members, and to others who are not members.

I now read from the evidence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] who presented the resolution to investigate.

Mr. KEIFER. So far I think no question of privilege has been stated.

Mr. WELLER. I am laying the basis for my question of privilege, and will amply disclose it in a moment if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will listen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that so far the gentleman has certainly not disclosed anything in the way of a matter of personal privilege. The gentleman will proceed and state his matter of privilege.

Mr. WELLER. I trust that no one will object or endeavor otherwise to hinder me, as I am one of the principal parties attacked by this resolution, and I propose to show it, and to show why the Republican members of the committee fail to state here openly that naught has been found against me.

I read from page 30 of the testimony taken before the investigating committee; first, the answer given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to a question by a member of the committee.

Mr. BAYNE answered—

A. What I know about it is purely a matter of information. I was told that Mr. WELLER, of Iowa, had been called from his seat, and had gone away from the House, and refused to take part any further in the deliberations and proceedings of the House on the morning referred to.

Q. Who was it gave you the information?

A. It was Mr. HORR, of Michigan; and if I do not mistake somebody else told me that, but who it was I am not sure.

Q. You do not remember who the other person was?

A. No, sir; I do not remember who the other person was.

Q. Did Mr. HORR profess to have personal knowledge of it, or did he derive his knowledge from information?

A. I do not know that Mr. HORR professed or did not profess to have personal knowledge. His statement to me was that Mr. WELLER had been approached, had been taken away from his seat, had a consultation with Mr. English, sr., and that Mr. WELLER had then disappeared from the House. It was on the strength of that information that I offered my resolution.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of order that the gentleman has not stated a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has so far not presented a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman from Ohio ought to withdraw the point of order. There is no question but that "the gentleman from Iowa" is indirectly affected in this investigation of Mr. English and the House owes it to him and itself to hear him. The majority report exonerates him entirely, and I understand that the minority concurred in this, although it does not appear in the minority views. In the interest of fair-play, I ask that no point of order be interposed. I understand that the committee unanimously agreed that no blame whatever attached to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER].

The SPEAKER. Without objection the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. REED. I should think we ought to have a right to make objection after we find out what it is about, if we can find that out.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman will be able to find it out if he bears with me patiently for a moment longer. I desire to make it clear beyond question that not even the shadow of stain is left to rest against me, my integrity or conduct in any particular involved in this investigation.

Mr. REED. There is too much patience in this matter.

Mr. WELLER. No doubt from your standpoint of observation there is.

Mr. KEIFER. The custom has been in such matters for a gentleman rising to a matter of personal privilege to disclose the fact at first that what he refers to does present a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. That is the custom of the House, and the gentleman from Iowa should present his question of privilege so that the House may determine for itself.

Mr. WELLER. The question of privilege is this: as I stated in my remarks on the floor of this House on the day subsequent to the introduction of the resolution for investigation by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], and which remarks I have just read, I supposed, from my reading of the record of proceedings then had, and also from the reading of this resolution in question that the committee appointed to investigate under the resolution were not only authorized but directed to make specific report as to my connection with the charges of improper conduct, but I find that the resolution was not so drawn as to direct a specific finding as to myself personally; but the majority report of the committee entirely and completely exonerates me; the minority report fails to make the least mention of my acts at that time, fails to allude to me at all. I want the minority to state unmistakably either that I am or am not guilty of improper conduct in the English-Peelle contest.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand there is not a man on the committee that does not exonerate the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENLEY. That is so. That is true of gentlemen on both sides.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad of it, and I want to put that in the RECORD.

Mr. WELLER. I want to go a step further. An examination of the minority report appears to show that it does not specifically involve me or my reputation one way or the other. It is true that the members of the committee on the Democratic side have made a report that completely exonerates me; that I am as free from anything dishonorable as a new-born babe, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD], member of the committee representing the other side, stated to me in the committee-room that there was nothing found against me, yet other gentlemen on the Republican side who were of the committee or implicated in making the charges or giving them currency, have here uttered no word exonerating me, but have made their remarks, or remained in their seats with closed lips, allowing the minority report to go to the country as a sort of a whitewash.

I say it seems to me this does involve my right to rise to a question of privilege. If I am not to be blamed, if there is no moral turpitude whatever that can be attached to me or to the course that I have heretofore pursued, it is but right, it seems to me, that I should in some way be permitted to so raise the question that the minority would be put to the necessity of a disclaimer or hereafter hold their peace.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand there was any charge against the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER], directly or indirectly, in the resolution directing the investigation. The Chair does not understand there is anything in the report of the majority or the report of the minority implicating the gentleman from Iowa in any manner whatever in any improper conduct. That being the case, unless the gentleman has something to state outside of the report, the Chair does not see that any matter of privilege is involved.

Mr. WELLER. Just a moment. I think I can bring it to the attention of the Speaker.

Mr. KEIFER. I insist on the point that there is no question of privilege involved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio insists on the point that there is no matter of privilege.

Mr. WELLER. I yield to the decision of the Chair, making, however, this statement that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD] said before the committee there was nothing in the testimony to implicate me; and I want him now to deny my present statement if my statement is not true.

Mr. HAMMOND. Before the question is put I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. It has been said that without a special motion therefor the report of the committee and the minority report would not be printed. I supposed they would be.

The SPEAKER. They will be printed as documents.

Mr. HAMMOND. So I supposed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] moves to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BAYNE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is not the vote to be taken first on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD]?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to lay the whole subject, including the majority and minority reports, on the table.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD] offers a substitute.

The SPEAKER. But the motion is to lay the whole subject on the table, which has precedence. Of course if the House refuses to lay the subject on the table——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then the resolution of the gentleman from New York would be in order?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the substitute is pending, but the gentleman from Georgia moves to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Georgia, as I understand, has reported a resolution for the action of the House?

Mr. HAMMOND. No, sir. On behalf of the committee I made a report recommending that the whole matter be laid on the table. I withheld that motion for an hour in order to permit discussion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending Juue 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating the internal-revenue laws, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LOGAN, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 6925) to amend sections 4381 and 4382 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to fees levied and collected from owners and masters of vessels in domestic commerce;

A bill (H. R. 6677) granting the consent of Congress to the Saint Cloud Water Power and Mill Company to erect a dam across the Mississippi River at Saint Cloud, Minn.;

A bill (H. R. 6409) to validate and cure defects in certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2041) granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island.

The message further requested the return to the Senate of the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

The message further announced that the Senate had proceeded in conformity with the Constitution to reconsider the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Fitz-John Porter," returned by the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with his objections, and passed by the House notwithstanding the objections, and had resolved that the said bill do not pass, two-thirds of the Senators present not voting in the affirmative.

RULES AND ARTICLES OF WAR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the request of the Senate for the return of a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with.

There was no objection.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH AND OTHERS.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. HAMMOND to lay on the table the subject of the charges against William H. English and others, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 72, not voting 115; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The following were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. MOULTON with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, with Mr. HOOPER.

Mr. DUNCAN with Mr. SMITH.

Mr. DOCKERY with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. JOHN S. WISE.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. SUMNER, of California, with Mr. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. BARR.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. BISBEE.

Mr. HILL with Mr. JEFFORDS.
The following were also announced as paired:
Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. NUTTING, until July 8.
Mr. DOWD with Mr. RAY, of New York, until July 8.
Mr. STRUBLE with Mr. STOCKSLAGER, on this vote. If present, Mr. STRUBLE would vote for the minority report, and Mr. STOCKSLAGER for the majority report.
Mr. ARNOT with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, on this vote.
Mr. LIBBEY with Mr. WOODWARD, on this vote.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. ROCKWELL, on this vote.
Mr. WELLER. I desire to say that, my name having been connected with this matter, I have refrained from voting.
The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.
Mr. HAMMOND moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:
A bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT OVER FOURTH OF JULY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next. I think it will facilitate the final adjournment by giving committees of conference an opportunity to complete their labors.
Mr. HAMMOND. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to say that he makes this motion for the purpose of facilitating the final adjournment?
Mr. HOLMAN. That is my opinion.
Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I suppose it will facilitate the final adjournment by passing over the Mexican-war pension bill.
Mr. RANDALL. No; we can take that up to-day and dispose of it.
Mr. REED. We all know that under the rules of the House one member can stop any business being done, and we know that the rules of the House will be thoroughly availed of. We know it has been done in the past and we know it will be in the present, and we may as well understand it.
Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will get into a good humor before we part.
Mr. HOLMAN. As my colleague [Mr. BROWNE] seems to think that the adjournment over to-morrow should not take place on account of the Mexican pension bill not having been disposed of, I do not think that I will press that motion.
Several MEMBERS (to Mr. HOLMAN). Withdraw the motion.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the motion?
Mr. KEIFER. I wish to suggest that something might arise in the way of conferences between the two Houses which would make it very important that the House should be in session to-morrow.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.
Mr. RANDALL. If we are to adjourn over we ought to know it immediately.
Mr. KEIFER. We ought not to adopt the motion now.
Mr. RANDALL. We ought to do it now or not at all.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the motion is withdrawn.
Mr. RANDALL. Then I renew it. We can go on with the Mexican pension bill at once, and can sit to-night if it should be necessary.
Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the motion.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.
The question being taken; there were—ayes 101, noes 51.
Mr. BURNES. No quorum.
Mr. PETERS. I call for the yeas and nays.
Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope that those who desire to pass the Mexican pension bill will not ask for the yeas and nays now. If it should become apparent later that the bill can not be passed without a session to-morrow, I will ask the House to revoke the order for adjourning over.
Several MEMBERS. All right.
Mr. PETERS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].
The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 120, noes 54.
So the motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.
Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with the morning hour.
Mr. JEFFORDS. I rise to a matter of privilege.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the question of consideration upon it.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JEFFORDS] will state his question of privilege.
Mr. JEFFORDS. I desire to call up for immediate action the report, with accompanying resolution, from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist on my motion.
The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands; but if this be a matter of privilege that motion can not be entertained now.
Mr. RANDALL. I reserve points of order upon the report of the gentleman from Mississippi.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi calls up as a matter of privilege the report of the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary question. Is it not competent to raise the question of consideration against the report?
The SPEAKER. It is; but the resolution must first be read, so that the House may know what it is.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. My purpose is to go to business on the Speaker's table, so as to get at the Mexican pension bill.
Mr. HOLMAN. The report of the gentleman from Mississippi is subject to a point of order, at any rate.
The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to reserve points of order. They can be made when the matter is before the House.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution called up by the gentleman from Mississippi.
Mr. JEFFORDS. I ask for the reading also of the report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to accept the proposition by them reported and attached to their report, and to at once proceed with the introduction and trial of the new system in accordance with the terms of said proposition.

The SPEAKER. On this resolution the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] raises the question of consideration.
Mr. TALBOTT. I make the point of order——
The SPEAKER. The matter is not yet before the House for consideration. The point of order can be made if the House should determine to consider it.
Mr. JEFFORDS. I asked for the reading of the report as well as the resolution.
The SPEAKER. The reading of the report would be in the nature of debate, and debate is not in order on a question as to the order of business.
The question being taken, will the House proceed to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, it was decided in the negative—ayes 49, noes 60.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move to dispense with the morning hour.
Mr. SCALES. I desire to present a report.
The SPEAKER. There is a matter before the House.
Mr. SCALES. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] yielded to me for this purpose.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend misunderstood me. I must insist on my motion.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to dispense with the morning hour, which requires a two-thirds vote.
The question being taken, there were—ayes 99, noes 37.
Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No quorum.
The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HEWITT, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND.
The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 130, noes 22.
Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No quorum has voted.
The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places, and members who have not voted are requested to pass between the tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 23.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make a privileged motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the hour of meeting of the House on Saturday next, July 5, be 9 o'clock a. m.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOURTH OF JULY WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. ROWELL submitted the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House 5377 for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officer's of the United States Treasury Department having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with the following amendment:

In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Mississippi:

"To Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, of Adams County, the sum of $35,556.17."

And the Senate agreee to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

JNO. B. STORM,
J. H. ROWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
ANGUS CAMERON,
C. F. MANDERSON,
JAMES Z. GEORGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement accompanying the report under the rules will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amended the bill by inserting a clause to pay Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, of Adams County, Mississippi, the sum of $85,556.17 for supplies alleged to have been taken from him by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The amendment to the Senate amendment as agreed upon diminishes the amount by $50,000 by striking out certain items included in the amount allowed to Mrs. Nutt in the Senate amendment.

The second amendment only goes to a change in the title to the bill.

JNO. B. STORM,
J. H. ROWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROWELL. I move the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING REPORT OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SCALES. I have a privileged motion to submit from the Committee on Printing for the printing necessary for the two Houses of Congress. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably joint resolution (H. Res. 276) providing for the printing of 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, of which 10,000 shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 35,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture; the illustrations to be executed under the supervision of the Public Printer, in accordance with directions of the Joint Committee on Printing; the work to be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. SCALES. The estimated cost is $16,521. I move the joint resolution be put on its passage.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Printing, reported, as a substitute for H. Res. 106, joint resolution (H. Res. 284) providing for printing additional copies of the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Public Printer is hereby authorized to print and bind in the usual style 5,000 additional copies of the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion, all of which are to be sold to applicants at cost with 10 per cent. added: Provided, That not more than one copy of each volume shall be sold to any one person.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call up for consideration, Mr. Speaker, the special order, that bill H. R. 3962, granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and other wars therein named, and for other purposes, be made the special order in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, on Thursday, the 21st day of February, 1884, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills or reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I have moved to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has called up the special order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is it?

The SPEAKER. The pension bill fixed by order of the House some time ago.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It was disposed of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. It was decided not to consider it yesterday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order against it.

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order, but the gentleman can raise the question of consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the reading of the bill so the House may know what they are voting on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentry inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Having made a motion to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, I ask whether the gentleman can take me off the floor by any motion he can make?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not take the gentleman off the floor; the gentleman did not have the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. You did.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then how can the gentleman take me off the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not hold the floor against everybody in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did, but pending that the gentleman from Alabama called for the special order, which is a privileged matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it not necessary to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. He could not raise the question of consideration against the gentleman's motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] raises the question of consideration against the special order called up by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, rose.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. LYMAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask to make a statement.

Objection was made.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 142, not voting 103; as follows:

So the motion to proceed with the special order was not agreed to.

Mr. YORK. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. CLAY. I object.

The Clerk then recapitulated the names of those recorded as having voted.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. REED with Mr. HAMMOND, on all questions, until further notice.

Mr. COOK with Mr. STRUBLE, on all political questions for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HARDEMAN. It is evident we can not get any justice for the Mexican soldiers, and I now move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House do now proceed to consider business on the Speaker's table, pending which the gentleman from Georgia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the regular order.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely, a bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company and for other purposes.

ADDITIONAL ENROLLING CLERKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to which I think nobody will object, in relation to the business of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it refers to the business of the House I will yield for a moment for its introduction.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to employ for the remainder of the present session two additional enrolling clerks, who shall be paid for their services out of the contingent fund of the House such sums as may be fixed by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. RANDALL. This has been done before and is necessary for the prompt enrollment of bills.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Regular order.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to suggest that it would be desirable to have the Committee on Enrolled Bills enlarged for the purpose of more readily comparing the bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to ask unanimous consent to appoint two additional members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills; and if there be no objection the Chair will make the appointments now.

There was no objection.

Mr. GLASCOCK and Mr. PETERS were appointed as additional members of the committee.

PAY OF STENOGRAPHERS FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have a resolution in relation to the business of the House to which I am satisfied there will be no objection when it is heard. It relates to the expenses of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and provides for the payment of the expense of employing stenographers, which expense can not be met unless this resolution is passed. The fund set apart for the committee was used for this purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it relates to the business of the House I shall not object, unless it leads to debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let it be read subject to objection.

The resolution was read. It is as follows:

Resolved, That there is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House a sum sufficient to pay for the service of stenographers to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, in addition to the amount heretofore allowed said committee, for the payment of the expenses of investigations; the accounts to be approved by the Committee on Accounts, as provided by the resolution of the House authorizing the appointment of stenographers to committees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me say that the clerk of the committee charged the expenses incurred for reporting testimony to the fund which had been appropriated by the House for the payment of the expenses of the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If I understand correctly, when the gentleman from Illinois was about to enter upon this investigation he asked the House for the appropriation of a certain sum, and stated then that that sum would cover all of the expenses of the investigation. Now, I think, sir, we had better let that sum cover it, as he then suggested, and for that reason I object to the resolution, and call for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for one moment, before insisting upon the demand, to hear a brief statement.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. At that time the law provided for the reporters of the committees and they were paid regular salaries like the other employés or officers of the House. But a week after the inauguration of this investigation the office of committee reporters was abolished, and the committees were authorized, as the gentleman will remember, to employ stenographers, to be approved by the Speaker of the House. This the committee have done; but the clerk charged the reporting of the committee to the fund set apart for its other incidental expenses, which more than exhaused the fund and left no provision for the payment of the expenses necessarily incurred by the committee in taking testimony. Now, unless this resolution is passed the expenses incurred can not be paid.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope my friend from Kentucky will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist upon his objection?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have no desire to take up the time of the House by debating the question or objecting. If the House is satisfied that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is doing the proper thing I am satisfied.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is trying to do the proper thing.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask a question of my colleague, whether the services to be paid for in this matter are services to be hereafter rendered?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; services already rendered.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then, even if the resolution passes, the accounts can not be paid in this way.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amount has been already paid, as I have said, but it is charged to the fund of the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But it was paid under the provisions of the law?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, the resolution required that it should be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; but it was charged to the fund of the committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table?

Mr. CLAY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 89.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question being taken on Mr. TOWNSHEND'S motion that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, there were—ayes 96, noes 12.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No quorum.

Mr. WASHBURN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 162, nays 39, not voting 123; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. CLAY. I object.

The names of members voting were read.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 25, noes 78.

So the House refused to adjourn.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, the pending business being the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read the second amendment of the Senate, as follows:

In line 18, strike out the word "wars" and insert the word "war."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur in the Senate amendment, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does not my motion to concur take precedence of a motion to concur with an amendment?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask for the reading of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Both motions are before the House. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] moves to concur with an amendment. The amendment will be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does not the motion I make have precedence?

The SPEAKER. It has not under the rules of the House. When the gentleman from Illinois moves to concur the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to move to amend by concurring with an amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, as follows:

And the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers in the military service of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army of the United States in Illinois in the Black Hawk war of 1832, or en route thereto, or in Alabama, Georgia, or Florida in the Creek war of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida war of 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1839, 1840, 1841, and 1842, or en route thereto, and who were honorably discharged: Provided, That the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or leg in the service, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit: "That from and after the passage of this act all persons on the pension-roll, and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who, while in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally or permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot, shall receive a pension of $30 per month; that all persons now on the pension-roll, and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who in like manner shall have lost either an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or shall have been otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor, but not so much as to require regular personal aid and attendance, shall receive a pension of $40 per month: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to repeal section 4699 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or to change the rate of $18 per month therein mentioned to be proportionately divided for any degree of disability established for which section 4695 makes no provision: And provided, That in order to provide the funds to pay the pensions provided for by this act, there shall be laid, assessed, and collected on all incomes of over $5,000 and under $10,000 a tax of 2 per cent. per annum; on all incomes of $10,000 and under $15,000 a tax of 3 per cent. per annum; on all incomes of $15,000 and under $20,000 a tax of 4 per cent. per annum; and on all incomes of $20,000 and over a tax of 5 per cent. per annum. The tax hereby laid shall be assessed and collected by the collectors of the internal revenue under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and all moneys collected under the provisions of this act shall be held as a sacred pension fund, and shall only be expended in the payment of pensions provided for in this act.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. And besides, it is a part of a bill already pending in the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The amendment contains a proposition to create an income tax, which certainly has no place in a pension bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Perhaps I have not made myself sufficiently explicit. If I am correctly advised the amendment to be in order must be germane to the Senate amendment which it seeks to amend. It must be not simply germane to the bill but germane to the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The amendment which I have offered contains three points. First, it provides for a pension for the soldiers of certain Indian wars. That is certainly in order. Secondly, it provides an increase of pension for a certain class of soldiers who were disabled in the late war. It increases the pension of all the soldiers of the late war who have lost one hand or one foot or been totally or permanently disabled in the same or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot—it increases the pension of such soldiers from $24 to $30 per month. And as regards all soldiers who have lost an arm at or above the elbow or a leg at or above the knee, and who are incapacitated for manual labor it increases their pension from $30 to $40 per month.

Now I have offered this amendment at the earnest request of representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And with no intention to vote for the bill even should the amendment be adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], "a friend of the pensioners," gets up here and makes a point of order against my amendment. Oh, yes! he is a friend of the soldier!

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is this in order upon the point of order? If so, then I would like to respond to it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I must state what my amendment is in order to speak to the point of order against it. The first two portions of the amendment are certainly in order. The third portion is intended to provide the means to pay for the pensions provided for by this act. That is all there is in the amendment. It seems to me that when you pass an act that requires money to carry it out any provision for supplying the means to carry it out is germane to the bill. If this bill shall pass in the shape in which it came from the Senate it will require $56,000,000 annually in excess of the amount now required for pensions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order, and, besides, I will say that the gentleman is in error any way; he is mistaken as to the amount this bill will call for.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist that the gentleman shall confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am discussing the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Commissioner of Pensions says that this bill will not increase the amount required for pensions over $12,500,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I want the people to know that, in passing this bill, instead of reducing taxes you will have to increase taxes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] must confine himself to the point of order. The point of order is made that the amendment proposed by him is not germane to the amendment of the Senate now under consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And I am replying to the point of order by showing that if this bill passes it will require $56,000,000 to discharge the pensions under this act, and my amendment provides the means of meeting those pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that has any bearing whatever on the point of order. The point of order is made that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] is not germane to the amendment which comes to the House from the Senate.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think it is, because this is a bill granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors——

The SPEAKER. But the Chair will state to the gentleman that when the Senate amends a bill of the House each amendment of the Senate stands by itself, a separate and independent proposition, a new proposition for the consideration of the House. The text of the bill, except so far as it may be affected by the amendments proposed by the Senate, is not now before the House for consideration, but has been agreed upon, and nothing this House can do will change it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But suppose the Senate had stricken out the soldiers of a certain war, would I not have the right to move to insert——

The SPEAKER. If the Senate had stricken out any provision of the bill and had inserted something else in its place, then the amendment of the Senate could be defeated by simply refusing to agree to it. If the Senate had moved to strike out and insert, it is competent to amend the matter which the Senate proposes to insert, provided the amendment is germane to the subject to which the amendment of the Senate relates. But the point of order made here is that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] is not germane to the subject to which the amendment of the Senate relates.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and others. Regular order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the Speaker rules that this amendment is not in order in this place, I will withdraw it and move to insert it when some subsequent amendment of the Senate shall have been reached.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not germane to the amendment of the Senate now under consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] withdraw his point of order against my amendment. He certainly is not afraid of a vote upon it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Whatever I might be inclined to do for a gentleman who is in favor of the bill, I can not withdraw my point of order for a gentleman who desires to defeat the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have been a better friend of the Mexican soldiers than the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote, but before the Speaker announced the result,

Mr. HARDEMAN moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is not in order while the House is engaged in voting.

The question was taken upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and upon a division there were—ayes 96, noes 18.

Mr. HARDEMAN, Mr. ROBERTSON, and others. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 46 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

PENSIONS FOR MEXICAN WAR, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

The question was upon concurring in the second amendment of the Senate, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 20, not voting 127; as follows:

Mr. LAMB. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], but understanding that on this question he would vote as I would, I have voted.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. LOWRY with Mr. DINGLEY, on this vote.

The following were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. MILLARD.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, with Mr. TALBOTT.

Mr. COOK with Mr. STRUBLE.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the House remain in session until we receive from the Senate the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh, the House will remain in session.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. We are going to stay here until we pass this bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HARDEMAN that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 35, noes 113.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now demand the regular order.

PRINTING REPORTS OF NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back for immediate consideration the joint resolution (H. R. 260) authorizing the printing and binding of additional copies of the reports of the National Board of Health.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

Report from the Committee on Printing on joint resolution (H. Res. 260,) authorizing the printing and binding of additional copies of the reports of the National Board of Health:

The reports for the years 1880, 1881, and 1882 of the National Board of Health contain many valuable papers, covering the results of long-continued and careful investigation in matters affecting the public health. These investigations have been made by men the most eminent in their several lines of study, and it is gratifying to be able to state that the leading sanitarians, both of this country and of Europe, agree in their estimate of the extraordinary value of the service thus rendered by the board. The reports embrace the results of investigations into yellow fever, cholera, diphtheria, the sanitary condition of our summer resorts, the effect produced upon water by its filtration through soils, the sewerage systems of Europe, the flow of sewers, and the analysis of water, together with reports on many other subjects relating to the public health.

The report on water analysis is regarded by all competent judges to be the most complete and valuable inquiry into the sanitary relations of potable water which has yet been made.

The report on the filtering capacity of soils made under the direction of Professor Raphael Pumpelly, of the Geological Survey, has awakened the liveliest interest among sanitarians all over the world, and has been pronounced to be one of the most important contributions ever made, to our knowledge, of the propagation of epidemic diseases.

The report on the sewerage systems of Europe gives in detail the general systems and their application, together with their cost of construction and maintenance, in the principal cities of Europe.

The subject of city and town sanitation is now attracting attention throughout the country, and all reports bearing upon sewerage, water supply, &c., are eagerly sought for.

It is unnecessary to refer in detail to all of the investigations made by the board. The constant demand for them from engineers, health authorities, students in colleges, and sanitarians both in this and foreign countries fully attest their value.

Of the reports published since that for 1879, only the usual number has been printed, and the supply of those for 1880 and 1881 has been exhausted, while the report for 1882 has but recently been delivered.

In view of the importance of the subjects treated, and of the great value of the contributions thus made to the general knowledge of sanitary subjects, the board has had its reports stereotyped, in order that the cost of reproduction might be reduced to the lowest possible point. The Public Printer estimates that it will cost $3,426 to print the number of copies of the reports for the years 1880, 1881, and 1882, called for in the resolution.

Your committee is of the opinion that every effort to improve the sanitary condition of the people should be fostered.

In view, therefore, of the importance of these reports in the addition which they make to our knowledge of sanitary subjects, we recommend the adoption of the resolution.

A. HERR SMITH.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind for use of the National Board of Health 2,000 copies of each of its annual reports, beginning with the year 1880.

Mr. SMITH. I am instructed by the committee to move an amendment, to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to provide for the printing of 1,000 copies instead of 2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH. I have two further reports which are not privileged, but I ask that they may be received and placed upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to make two reports from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. SMITH. They will create no discussion.

Several members called for the regular order.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6925) to amend sections 4381 and 4382 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to fees levied and collected from the owners and masters of vessels in domestic commerce.

RELIEF FROM CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4383), an act to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from Senate amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

And the House recedes from Senate amendment numbered 1, with an amendment as follows:

At end of section 1 insert:

"Provided, That no soldier shall be relieved under this section who, not being sick or wounded, left his command without proper authority while the same was in the presence of the enemy."

And also recedes from Senate amendment numbered 2, with an amendment as follows:

In first paragraph strike out the words "the service," and insert the words "his command," and in second paragraph strike out the words "the service" and insert the words "his command."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. S. ROSECRANS,
CHARLES H. MORGAN,
GEO. W. STEELE,
Managers on the part of the House.
F. M. COCKRELL,
BENJ. HARRISON,
W. J. SEWELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. LAIRD. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: In section 5, after the word "rebellion," insert the words "and the volunteer soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and of the Mexican war;" also by adding the following proviso to section 5:

"Provided, Such disability was not incurred in service against the United States."

W. S. ROSECRANS,
CHARLES H. MORGAN,
J. LAIRD,
Managers on the part of the House.
BENJ. HARRISON,
JNO. F. MILLER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. LAIRD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN PENSION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third amendment: Page 1, line 12, strike out the words "although the term of service may have been less than sixty days."

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment: Page 1, lines 14 and 15, strike out "as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur, and demand the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to a point of order that this amendment, under Rule XX, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that this amendment, under Rule XX, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair will hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The bill as it passed the House is to pension such widows as were married to soldiers prior to their discharge from the service. The Senate strikes out that limitation and confers the pension on the widow regardless of the time when she may have been married.

The SPEAKER. That is not the amendment under consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes; it is the fourth amendment. Rule XX requires an amendment of the Senate to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the point of order is made, provided if that amendment had been an original bill in the House it would be subject to the point of order. If the law stood as the bill passed the House, giving a pension to the widows of soldiers of the Mexican war who were married prior to the discharge of the soldier, and if a bill should be introduced to amend that law by striking out that provision, it would clearly be subject to the point of order and would have to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its first consideration, because it pensions persons not entitled to pensions under the law as it stood.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will not discuss the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois the question whether or not this amendment of the Senate does not increase the number of persons to whom pensions will be allowed under this act, and if so whether it does not come within the terms of Rule XX. The Chair will state the original bill seems to have confined pensions to the widows married previous to the soldiers' discharge.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is true.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendment strikes that out and gives pensions to surviving widows of soldiers, no matter when they were married, not only those married before the expiration of the term but those married afterward.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then upon that statement I submit to the Chair whether the point of order is good under the third clause of Rule XXIII, and I presume that is the clause to which the gentleman from Alabama refers.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order under the provisions of Rule XX.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, that can not be sustained. I presume it is made under the third clause of Rule XXIII, that all motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people, &c., shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

I can not see how the gentleman can sustain his point of order upon the provisions of Rule XX. It must be upon the rule that I have read, if any; and where this amendment is subject to the point of order, I am not able to see.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Alabama is under the provisions of Rule XX, that any amendment of the Senate which if it had originated in the House would have been subject to the point of order, is still subject to the same rule if the point of order is made against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But the gentleman does not point out wherein it is subject to the point of order; he simply makes an assertion that it is. He says that under certain circumstances the point might be made. The provisions of Rule XX are:

Any amendment of the Senate to any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if, originating in the House, it would be subject to that point.

Now, under that rule is this amendment subject to the point of order? I repeat, I presume that he bases it upon the third clause of Rule XXIII.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated that he bases his point of order on Rule XX.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have made the point of order to the Speaker. I have been addressing the Chair on the point of order, and he understands it if the gentleman from Illinois does not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Alabama claims the effect of the Senate amendment is to increase the number of persons who will receive pensions under the operations of this bill if it shall become a law over the number who would have been pensioned according to the provisions of the original bill.

That is to say, if the bill provided that hereafter the widows of soldiers who had served in the war of 1812 should be pensioned, provided they were married to such soldiers before the service began, and it was proposed to amend the bill by inserting a provision so as to make it include the widows of all such soldiers no matter whether they were married before or after the service began, the question is, would not that provision, if the point of order was made, have to be considered in a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In answer to that suggestion I make this point: The amendment upon its face does not directly involve the expenditure of an additional dollar of money.

Now, in the first place, to sustain the point of order it will be necessary to assume that there were soldiers who married subsequent to their discharge from that service. It does not so appear from the face of the amendment. It does not appear upon the face of the amendment that any of these soldiers married after the service.

It is only by argument that it can be claimed to involve an expenditure. It must, according to the rule, upon its face show an additional expenditure of money in order to make it subject to the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1250) for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to take up the message from the Senate for the purpose of moving non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate to the fortification appropriation bill and asking the appointment of a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. KEIFER. Perhaps we had better have the amendments read. We may avoid a disagreement.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is better that it should take this course.

The motion to non-concur was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. Before the appointment of the conferees is made I desire to state that it is usual as I understand to appoint those gentlemen as conferees who have prepared the bill. We prepared the bill which was defeated by the House, and the substitute of the minority adopted. I believe the conferees should represent the will of the House. Believing so I must therefore ask to be excused from service on the conference committee, and beg the Chair will appoint some other gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the practice of the House has always been to appoint as managers on the part of the House at a conference gentlemen who represent the prevailing sentiment of the House on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the practice; but the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana is very considerate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not appoint any gentleman who represented the original bill, but those who represent the views of the House as expressed by the vote upon the substitute.

Mr. ELLIS. I desired to make this statement in order to avoid any mistake; and I wish to suggest further, that it is shared in by my coassociates upon the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL; the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. FORNEY; and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. KEIFER.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The House will resume the consideration of the pension bill.

The point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is pending.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the difficulty about the point of order made here arises in the fact that it is in the nature of an amendment to strike out a portion of the House bill, and does not come here as an affirmative action on the part of the Senate in the form of an amendment, which amendment might be of a character, if originated in the House, to require its consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I think the difficulty is in giving application to the mere fact that this strikes out a part of the House bill and changes the number of persons perhaps who would become pensioners under the bill if it becomes a law. That can hardly be a sufficient reason for making the point of order.

I think it is not very important whether the point of order be sustained now or on the next proposition we reach that may be subject to the point of order. But I consider it would be a doubtful policy to hold that an amendment of the Senate which simply struck out a part of the House bill when it came here would be subject to the point of order that we must consider that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Must not the Chair look to the effect of a proposed amendment to see whether it does or does not increase the expenditures?

Mr. KEIFER. If it is an amendment of the Senate in the nature of an addition to the bill I have no doubt the Chair would have to look to the effect of it. But when we are dealing with the substance of the House bill itself it is hard to see how such an amendment as that could have originated in the House at all under any circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Suppose the House bill had been a law; for that is the way in which the Chair must look at it for the purpose of deciding this question. Suppose there was a law which provided for the giving of pensions only to those widows who were married before the discharge of the soldiers or the sailors; and suppose a proposition is made by a bill or amendment to add another clause which comes in the form of a proposition to strike out that limitation of the existing law, and the effect of which is to add another class of persons to the pension-roll, would not that be subject to the point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. There is force in what the Chair suggests. But a literal construction of Rule XX I think would not bring this within the rule, because it is not an amendment that could have originated in the House.

The SPEAKER. But a bill might have originated in the House to do this thing. And if the proposition is one which if it originated in the House would have been subject to the point of order then it is subject to the point of order under Rule XX, when it comes in the form of an amendment of the Senate. The Chair is inclined to think the point of order is well taken, but at the same time is not entirely clear about it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It strikes me the Chair is correct in assuming that this amendment on its face increases the number of beneficiaries, and that it must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if the point is made. If the gentlemen who are opposed to the bill in its present shape are determined to send it there, it may as well go now. It may have to go under some of the subsequent amendments, and it is likely we can reach it in Committee of the Whole sooner by getting it there now than by allowing the gentlemen on the other side to filibuster two hours longer and then send it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the point of order is well taken. The amendment will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the Chair decide that the bill now goes to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House can proceed to dispose of other amendments of the Senate not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment must be considered in Committee of the Whole. But the Chair holds the House can proceed with the other amendments, and dispose in the House of those that are not subject to the point of order.

The Clerk read the fifth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

In lines 23, 24, and 25, strike out these words:
"And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any person not a citizen of the United States."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Does not this limit the number of beneficiaries?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. To strike out these words increases the number, because it lets in those who are not citizens of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the amendment would seem to be to allow pensions to be given to persons who are not citizens. The point of order is well taken. The next amendment will be read.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

In line 25 insert: "(6) Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the rebellion against the authority of the United States."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to concur in that amendment, and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope the House will not concur in that amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him to state the effect of that amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist on my call for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 27.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No quorum.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the yeas and nays. We may as well have the yeas and nays at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 48 members voting therefor.

Mr. LAMB. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. This vote is upon ordering the previous question, as demanded by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 26, not voting 164; as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. GUENTHER, on all questions for this day.

Mr. OCHILTREE with Mr. TUCKER, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. TULLY with Mr. DIBRELL, for this day.

Mr. CLAY with Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. REESE with Mr. ELLIOTT, on this bill. Mr. REESE would vote "no," and Mr. ELLIOTT would vote "ay."

Mr. HERBERT with Mr. BEACH, on this bill.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, for the remainder of the day. Mr. MILLER would vote to concur in the Senate amendments to the pending bill and Mr. TURNER would vote against concurring.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, on the pending bill. Mr. TAYLOR would vote "no" and Mr. POST would vote "ay."

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. STORM, on this bill. Mr. YOUNG would vote "ay" and Mr. STORM would vote "no."

Mr. PAYSON with Mr. OATES, on the pending bill, for this day. Mr. PAYSON would vote for the bill and Mr. OATES against it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, until further notice.

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. COBB, for the remainder of to-day's session.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am announced as paired with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I did not suppose that the pair would take effect until to-morrow, and therefore I have voted. But assuming that Mr. O'NEILL, if present, would have also voted "ay," I will allow my vote to stand.

The SPEAKER. Upon ordering the previous question the yeas are 134, the noes 26.

Mr. VAN EATON. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I request the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to permit me to ask unanimous consent to have a division of the question on this amendment of the Senate, so as to strike out all after the word "act," in line 31.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to avoid the question of a quorum I would have no objection to allowing a separate vote, as requested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE]. In reality, I myself do not like the amendment of the Senate, but to secure the passage of the bill I feel that I must insist upon concurring in every amendment of the Senate. However, to avoid delay, I hope consent will be given to have the amendment divided.

The SPEAKER. But the record shows that no quorum is present.

Mr. BARKSDALE. In order to explain my meaning, I will say that I ask a separate vote on this portion of the Senate amendment:

But it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. GARRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 56, noes 72.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand that the last vote by yeas and nays disclosed the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. It did.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is perfectly clear that we can do nothing in the absence of a quorum of the House, and I therefore move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered; there being upon a division—ayes 64, noes 56.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 57, noes 74.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, said: I think we had better have the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 32 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. That is more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted, there being 96.

The SPEAKER. Upon ordering the yeas and nays, the ayes are 32, noes 96. More than one-fifth voting in favor thereof, the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 49, nays 111, not voting 164; as follows:

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, on the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. VAN EATON, for the remainder of the day, on the Mexican pension bill. Mr. RIGGS would vote for the bill at all its stages and Mr. VAN EATON against it.

Mr. GOFF with Mr. MULDROW, on all political questions, for the remainder of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 6514) for the relief of Catharine H. Glick.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War, and requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LOGAN, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. MAXEY.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. DAWES, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. COCKRELL.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), 1. That the Joint Committee on Public Printing is hereby instructed to examine into the numbers printed of the various documents, reports, bills, and other papers published by order of Congress, or of either House thereof, and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to report a bill in December next, making such restrictions in the numbers and cost of printing, and such changes and reductions in the distribution of said publications as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and that the said committee is also instructed to investigate the printing and binding for the Executive Departments, executed at the Government Printing Office, and at the branch printing offices and binderies in the various Departments, and report a bill in December next making such reductions in expenses and imposing such checks as they may deem expedient, with a report giving their reasons therefor; and said committee is further instructed to make any other investigations calculated in their opinion to reduce the cost of the public printing, and report the result thereof; and the said committee is hereby authorized to summon and to examine experts and witnesses, and to call upon the heads of the Executive Departments and the Public Printer for such information regarding the preceding matters as they may desire; and any expenses necessarily incurred in making the investigations aforesaid shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress.

2. Said committee is hereby authorized to sit during the recess for the purposes of the first section hereof and in the discharge of its usual duties.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House having been ordered, the Clerk will now proceed to call the roll.

The roll was called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken,	Deuster,	Jones, J. T.	Reagan,
Anderson,	Dingley,	Kasson,	Reese,

The SPEAKER. The doors of the House will now be closed. On this call one hundred and eighty-seven members have responded to their names.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will not adjourn. I think it important, when the House shall cease work to-day, that it shall take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. The conference committee on the deficiency bill have concluded their deliberations so far as they can as conferees. The controversy betweeen the conferees must now be settled by their respective Houses. It is therefore important that a recess be taken until to-morrow at 10 o'clock, and by that time the committee on conference will be ready to report. I do not desire to make any motion now, but I suggest that when the House ceases its labors to-day it shall take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Before a motion can be made for a recess, the House must dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think I can make a proposition which will meet the approval of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion of Mr. THOMPSON was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will reopen the doors.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to make an inquiry in reference to the deficiency bill, whether or not it is likely that the conferees will be able to make any report to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a possibility that the clerks may have the report ready so that the signatures can be attached some time to-night, I can not say at what hour—perhaps 9 or 10 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to submit this proposition, that for the purpose of ending the struggle on the Mexican war pension bill, the House agree to non-concur in the Senate amendments and send the bill to a committee of conference at once.

Mr. DUNN. Ah!

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. BLOUNT and others. There is.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the House take a recess till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope that motion will be voted down.

The motion of Mr. THOMPSON was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till to-morrow at 10 o'clock a. m.

AFTER RECESS.

At 10 o'clock a. m., Friday, July 4, the House resumed its session.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. HEWITT, of New York, indefinitely after to-day.

To Mr. THROCKMORTON, for the remainder of the day on account of indisposition.

To Mr. ANDERSON, for the remainder of the session on account of sickness.

To Mr. RAY, of New York, indefinitely on account of important business.

To Mr. CANDLER, after to-day on account of important business.

To Mr. CURTIN, for ten days.

To Mr. BRAINERD, for one week after to-day on account of important business.

To Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, for the remainder of this legislative day on account of sickness.

To Mr. MATSON, for ten days on account of important business.

To Mr. BEACH, for the balance of the day, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. O'FERRALL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, for the balance of the day's session.

To Mr. ARNOT, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WARD, for the remainder of the session, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAMB, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. COBB, for to-day.

To Mr. SPRIGGS, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KING, for four days.

To Mr. CONNOLLY, for one week, on account of important business.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM FOWLE, DECEASED.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the claim of the estate of William Fowle, deceased.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PARKER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD some remarks on the subject of the public lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS was also granted leave to print some remarks on the educational bill.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, in behalf of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, leave was granted for that committee to file its report and the views of the minority with the Clerk of the House within sixty days after the adjournment, and that the report and views of the minority be printed.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREY AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER. At the request of the House the Senate has returned a bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others for the purpose of correcting an alleged mistake in its engrossment. When this bill was before the House the other morning it was taken up by unanimous consent and certain words recommended to be inserted by the Committee on War Claims were stricken out of the bill as sent from the Clerk's desk, a line being drawn through them, but the clerk in engrossing the bill has included those words. The Clerk will read the words:

The Clerk read as follows:

And the proceeds thereof received by the authorized agents of the United States.

Mr. POWELL. The engrossment was wrong.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the engrossment of the bill will be corrected.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HALL.

Mr. HARDY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Acoustics and Ventilation, submitted the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ventilation of the Hall of the House of Representatives, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to sit during the recess with like power and authority as when Congress is in session.

Resolved, That said committee shall have control of the lighting, heating, and ventilating of the Hall of the House of Representatives at all times when the House is not in session: Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to authorize said committee to interfere with any alteration or improvement heretofore directed by law.

Mr. YOUNG. I did not gather the terms of the resolution, as it was read.

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution authorizing the committee to sit during the recess.

Mr. HARDY. It is in the same terms precisely as one submitted by the present Speaker of the House in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to instruct the committee to examine certain methods of ventilating the Hall and report to the next session of Congress. I am satisfied improvement can be made on the present system, and the committee ought to be instructed to make thorough investigation to that end. I had prepared a resolution, and without knowing exactly how it will come in as an amendment to the present resolution, I will nevertheless offer it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to accept the proposition for testing the new system of the Exhaust Ventilator Company, of Chicago, and also the plans and system of any other company or persons for ventilating the Capitol, and report to the next session of this House the result of the experiments made by them.

Mr. HARDY. I object to that as an amendment to the resolution I have offered. It is not germane at all events.

Mr. YOUNG. At the time I prepared this resolution I did not know that a similar proposition was to be offered giving authority to the committee. I therefore move to strike out the names of the persons mentioned in that amendment or to modify it in that way, and give this authority to the committee as proposed by the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARDY. The resolution originally offered provides that this shall be under the charge of the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, that committee properly having control of the subject.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to ask if under that resolution this committee would have the power to rearrange the desks and seats of members on this floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. YOUNG. They ought to have that power.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope such authority will be given to the committee so that these desks may be removed and the seats rearranged for the convenience of members.

Mr. YOUNG. It will be a very proper thing to authorize the committee to look into and consider the subject at all events.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If that power is not already conferred upon the committee I hope they will ask for it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would not be willing to authorize any committee to take away the desks.

Mr. HARDY. Such authority is not embodied in the original resolution, and if it is deemed necessary by the House to assign that duty to the committee I should much prefer it being done under another and separate resolution.

It is necessary that the resolution offered by the committee should be adopted so that such matters as relate to the acoustics and ventilation of the Hall may be referred to them for action and report to the House. There is no objection to the consideration of the subject suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, if the House shall see fit to direct the committee to consider it; but I hope the authority to do so will not be incorporated as an amendment upon this resolution. I trust this resolution will be adopted as it is, and then if the House deem it necessary to confer further authority upon the committee let that be done under a separate proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order as an amendment to the pending proposition.

Mr. YOUNG. I withdraw the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARDY. On that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TUCKER. I appeal to my friend from Arkansas to withdraw the call for the regular order in order that I may be permitted to call up a Senate bill for the relief of a man from political disabilities. He is a soldier in the Army, a private in the ranks, and is disabled from even being promoted to the position of corporal in the Army of the United States, by reason of the twelve hundred and eighteenth section of the Revised Statutes. I ask, therefore, to have his disabilities removed.

Mr. DUNN. I regret very much that the distinguished gentleman from Virginia can not reach the measure he desires under the rules of this House. I am anxious to have a rule adopted which will enable him and other members of the House to do so. But, sir, I desire to say that while I will make no objection to the necessary orders to correct clerical errors and mistakes in the enrollment and transmission of bills between the two Houses, or their preparation for final disposal, nor object to the necessary orders to further facilitate the reports of conference committees, nor make objection to necessary orders to facilitate, perfect, and continue investigations ordered by the House, I shall, as to everything else, feel compelled to make objection until we can have a rule adopted that will secure an opportunity for everybody to have such measures properly attended to before the House.

Mr. REED. We can not crowd everybody into two days.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the demand for the regular order for a moment. I have a matter here which will not occupy much time. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I arise to submit a privileged report.

I am directed by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate bill No. 838 to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments and that the conferees of the Senate and House agree to the Senate bill with the following amendments: In line 6 strike out the word "two" and insert the word "three;" and in line 8 strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three."

W. S. ROSECRANS,
CHAS. H. MORGAN,
B. M. CUTCHEON,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
W. J. SEWELL,
S. B. MAXEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move the adoption of the report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. A request for unanimous consent can not be entertained when the regular order is insisted on by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] and other gentlemen on the floor as well. There is another matter of privilege called up by the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS].

RULES AND ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask for the reading of the message of the Senate in relation to the bill H. R. 5709.

The Clerk read the message of the Senate, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 3, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate ask a conference with the House on the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

Ordered, That Mr. LOGAN, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. MAXEY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked for.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from California, Mr. ROSECRANS, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MURRAY, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LYMAN.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6409) to validate and cure defects in certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, and for other purposes.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to call up a matter which will fall within the rule stated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for by several members.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to concur in the sixth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I rise to renew my request for unanimous consent to have a separate vote on this portion of the Senate amendment:

But it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am willing for my part to agree to that request.

Several members objected and called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Was not the demand for the previous question sustained?

The SPEAKER. It was not. The vote was taken yesterday afternoon by yeas and nays, and no quorum appeared.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can the order for yeas and nays be vacated by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It can.

Several members objected.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 13, not voting 188; as follows:

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let them be read.

The names of members voting were read.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOLMES, until further notice.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, until Saturday.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. STRUBLE, on this vote.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. HOWEY, for to-day.

Mr. HANCOCK with Mr. CANNON, for this day.

Mr. SINGLETON with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, on the Mexican pension bill and amendments thereto.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I desire to state in behalf of the parties interested that Mr. HANCOCK and Mr. CANNON are absent by order of the House, in conference upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. They are paired pending such absence. If present, Mr. HANCOCK would vote against and Mr. CANNON for the Senate amendments to the Mexican pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Upon this vote the yeas are 121, the nays are 12. No quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move a call of the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—33 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 45, not voting 128; as follows:

So a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. PARKER. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. CRISP. My colleague, Mr. CLEMENTS, is confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for to-day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. My colleague from Arkansas, Mr. JONES, desires, on account of sickness, to be excused indefinitely from attendance at the House.

There being no objection, indefinite leave of absence was granted.

Mr. REESE. I desire to ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. CLEMENTS, on account of sickness.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. RYAN. My colleague, Mr. ANDERSON, left the House yesterday, complaining of illness.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He was granted leave of absence this morning.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House has been ordered. The roll will be called.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

Adams, J. J.	Collins,	Henderson, T. J.	Paige,
Aiken,	Converse,	Hill,	Patton,
Anderson,	Cook,	Holman,	Pettibone,

Clardy,	Hancock,	Nicholls,	Wise, J. S.
Clements,	Hardeman,	Nutting,	Worthington.
Cobb,	Haynes,	O'Ferrall,

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BAGLEY). The Clerk will now call the names of the absentees, for whom excuses may now be made. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the doors are closed.

Mr. LORE. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. DUNN. I have a written communication from my colleague, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, who is at home sick in bed. I ask leave of absence for him.

There being no objection, leave of absence was granted.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-five members have answered to their names. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE] moves that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 33, noes 101—more than one-fifth in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 166, nays 24, not voting 134; as follows:

So the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND]. I voted on this question for the purpose merely of making a quorum. As I find my vote is not necessary for that purpose I withdraw it.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. HISCOCK, on all political questions, for this day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say that during the vote preceding the last the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HANCOCK, and myself were absent by order of the House on a conference committee.

INVESTIGATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PEEL. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to submit a resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this will not occupy any length of time I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] asks unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs for present consideration the resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by this House on the 31st day of May, 1884, authorizing the Committee on Indian Affairs or any subcommittee thereof, in order more thoroughly to investigate all matters touching the leasing, subleasing, fencing, and inclosing of lands in the Indian Territory and reservations by citizens of the United States, and for other purposes, be amended by adding thereto as follows:

And that said committee or subcommittee is further instructed to inquire into the condition of the several tribes and bands of Indians in the Indian Territory; the tenure by which the lands in the Indian Territory are now held, and the character of their actual occupation and use; the condition and rights of the freedmen and other residents in said Territory; the relation of said tribes to the United States and to each other, and the need, if any, of legislation in respect to the same; and for the purpose aforesaid shall have power to sit during the recess of the House at such times and places as the committee may determine, and shall report their proceedings to the House at its next session. And in order to defray the expenses of said investigation the Clerk of the House is directed to pay to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $2,000, whose receipt shall be a good and sufficient voucher to the Clerk in the settlement of his account. The aforesaid sum of money, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be disbursed on vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee; and the Sergeant-at-Arms shall make report to this House in detail of the manner in which said sum has been expended, accompanied by vouchers, which report when examined and approved by the Committee on Accounts shall be deemed a sufficient settlement of his accountability therefor; and any unexpended balance in his hands shall be paid by him into the Treasury to the credit of the fund from which it is paid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. VALENTINE, Mr. BLOUNT, and others objected.

Mr. WELLBORN. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] who objected will be willing to withhold his objection until an explanation has been made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] also objected.

Mr. VALENTINE. I object to all junketing trips.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection for a statement?

Several members renewed the objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

CORRECTION.

Mr. STORM. Mr. YOUNG and myself are announced as paired on the sixth amendment of the Senate to the Mexican pension bill, and that Mr. YOUNG would vote "ay" and I would vote "no." It is just the reverse; I would vote "ay" and Mr. YOUNG would vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. HUNT. I have been requested to announce that Mr. BLANCHARD, Mr. WILLIS, and Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, are absent by order of the House on a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that all gentlemen who are absent from the House attending conferences are regarded as being absent by leave of the House. It is therefore unnecessary to obtain leave or make request for it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

CHARLES F. HAYES.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Charles F. Hayes and House bill 324 "for the relief of Charles F. Hayes," there having been no adverse report on said bill.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. JORDAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print remarks on educational bill and House bill 5694.

APPLETON OAKSMITH.

On motion of Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in connection with House bill 3183, Forty-fifth Congress, for the relief of Appleton Oaksmith without leaving certified copies.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I submit the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House now go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering that great state paper, the Declaration of Independence, and that important document be now read for the information of the members who are not absent from their post of duty.

MEXICAN PENSION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this is a matter of privilege, the House being engaged in taking a vote, which has failed simply because a quorum did not vote on it.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] for the previous question on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 9, not voting 166; as follows:

So (no quorum having voted) the previous question was not ordered.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DOWD with Mr. ELLWOOD, on all questions to-day and until July 5.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. REED. I have voted on this call to make a quorum, although I am paired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move a call of the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 30 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 19, not voting 159; as follows:

So a call of the House was ordered.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. PAIGE and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I believe the announcement of the vote shows that there is a quorum present. [Cries of "Regular order!"] It is evident that we can not proceed with this business. There are yet fourteen amendments to be considered. We are now upon the sixth, having occupied all of yesterday afternoon and this morning since ten o'clock. I think, sir, that we had better drop this subject and proceed to the consideration of some other on which the House can agree. [Loud cries of "Regular order!"] I therefore ask unanimous consent to take up the educational bill, which appropriates money to aid the cause of education in this country, believing that our Democratic friends ought to be educated at least to enable them to read the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded; and the first thing in order before entertaining a request for unanimous consent would be to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which amendments the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska; and

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate further insisted on its amendments numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 19, 21, 22, 39, 47, 48, 49, 85, 86, 87, 92, 101, 110, 117, 122, and 138 to said bill, and asked a further conference with the House thereon; and had appointed Messrs. HALE, ALLISON, and COCKRELL as managers at said conference on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the House, which has been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken,	Cobb,	Holton,	Pettibone,
Anderson,	Converse,	Horr,	Ray, G. W.
Arnot,	Cook,	Houk,	Reagan,
Barr,	Covington,	Hurd,	Rice,

Chalmers,	Haynes,	O'Ferrall,	Woodward,
Clardy,	Hill,	Paige,	Worthington,
Clements,	Holman,	Patton,	Young.

The SPEAKER. Upon this call 229 members have answered to their names. The Doorkeeper will close the doors.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House dispense with further proceedings under the call, so that I may call up a conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill for consideration at this time.

The motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6514) for the relief of Catherine H. Glick; and

A bill (H. R. 6657) granting the consent of Congress to the Saint Cloud Water-Power and Mill Company to construct a dam across the Mississippi River, at Saint Cloud, Minn.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the report of the committee of conference on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky (interrupting the reading). I ask that the reading of the mere numbers of the amendments recommended to be agreed to or disagreed to be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done. But the rules of the House require that a detailed statement shall accompany the report explaining the recommendations of the committee. That statement will be read after the reading of the conference report.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask as a favor of the House that members will give diligent attention to the reading of the report and the statement, so that they may understand the effect of the recommendations of the committee without the necessity of lengthy explanations, as I desire to save all the time possible as well as to save my strength as far as I am able.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will finish reading the conference report.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report, which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 12, 13, 14, 17, 20, 23, 40, 52, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 69, 70, 72, 73, 74, 77, 78, 80, 88, 89, 90, 91, 93, 94, 114, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 139, 140, 141, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, and 223.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 15, 16, 18, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 34, 35, 37, 38, 41, 42, 44, 50, 51, 53, 56, 57, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 68, 71, 75, 76, 79, 81, 82, 83, 84, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 111, 112, 113, 115, 116, 119, 120, 121, 123, 124, 125, 142, 150, 151, 159, 160, 169, and 176, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "And hereafter it shall not be lawful for any consular officer to appropriate to his own use, or expend from the amount received from the fees of his office, any sum in excess of the allowance of salary and fees directly authorized by law, and consular officers paid exclusively by fees, and consuls paid in part by salary and in part by fees, shall only appropriate to their own use or expend such portion of the fees as is authorized by law;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$250,333.29;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out the name "Albert Grant," and in lieu thereof insert the names "Frank A. Behan, Francis A. Gibbons;" and after the word "provided," where it first occurs in said amendment, insert the following words "is hereby appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$822.96;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: After the word "for," where it first occurs in said amendment, strike out the words "ordnance, twenty thousand dollars; for," and in lieu of the total sum stated in said amendment insert "$2,900;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 45 and 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following: "For payment in full of expenses, and for compensation of civil commissioner appointed under provisions of act of August 5, 1882, $3,788.81;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 67, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment, after the word "payment," insert the words "to the estate of A. D. Fisher;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 109, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the name "Vaugneder," and in lieu of the name stricken out insert "Vangender;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 118, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the Senate amendment insert the following: "And the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby directed to proceed against the warrantors upon the covenants in the conveyance and recover back said sum in the name of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 149, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: On page 55 of the bill, in line 17, after the word "may," insert the words "after due notice and opportunity for hearing;" and after the word "sustain," in the same line, strike out the words "debar, dismiss;" and after the word "to," in line 20, strike out the words "abide by" and insert the words "comply with;" and after the word "shall," in line 21, insert the words "and with intent to defraud;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference has been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 19, 21, 22, 39, 47, 48, 49, 85, 86, 87, 92, 101, 110, 117, 122, and 138.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
JAMES N. BURNES,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the statement accompanying the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year 1884, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the conference report submitted:

The bill as it passed the Senate appropriated $7,846,336.69, being $1,124,570.04 in excess of the bill as it passed the House.

The Senate by amendments added to the bill $1,263,514.56 and reduced therefrom $138,944.52, making, as above given, a net increase of $1,124,570.04.

The conference committee has agreed upon all but twenty-three of the two hundred and twenty-three amendments of the Senate to the bill. In arriving at this agreement it is recommended that the Senate recede from amendments which appropriate $327,932.88, and that the House agree to amendments appropriating $176,359.14.

The amendments upon which the conference committee reports that it is unable to agree involve the appropriation of $759,222.54, and are as follows:

Amendments 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 provide for paving streets and alleys around public buildings in Des Moines, Hartford, Jersey City, Saint Louis, and Grand Rapids.

Amendments 10 and 11 appropriate $6,758.31 for expenses of collecting internal revenue in 1883 and $150,000 for the same purpose in 1884.

Amendment 19 appropriates $43,151.17 to pay to the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada the 15 per cent. of the amount of their quota for the direct tax of 1861, on account of the proper costs for assuming the collection of the same.

Amendment 21 appropriates $5,000 to pay a judgment in favor of J. D. Culp & Co. against a collector of internal revenue in California.

Amendment 22 appropriates $3,950.73 to reimburse the amount paid for expenses of the commission to go in Louisiana in April, 1877.

Amendment 39 appropriates $33,771.69 to pay awards made by the commissioners under the act of 1875 to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers.

Amendments 47, 48, and 49 provide for payment to the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, $67,987; to William Cramp & Sons, $75,790, and to John Roach, $69,201, respectively, for the use and occupation of their ship-yards by the ironclads Amphitrite, Terror, and Puritan.

Amendments 85, 86, and 87 appropriate $90,000 for United States attorneys, and $75,000 for United States marshals.

Amendment 92 strikes out the provision that no part of the appropriation for United States attorneys shall be used to pay special counsel fees.

Amendment 101 appropriates $33,482 for miscellaneous expenses of the Senate.

Amendment 110 strikes out provision to repeal an appropriation in the agricultural bill of $25,000 for the investigation of infectious and contagious diseases of domestic animals.

Amendment 117 appropriates $175,000 for the payment for land taken for a reservoir for the water-works in the District of Columbia.

Amendment 122 strikes out that portion of section 2 of the bill which provides a statute of limitations against claims against the Government.

Amendment 138 strikes out the provision that before any of the claims for difference between amount paid and legal compensation claimed by certain customs officers under sections 2733 and 2738 of the Revised Statutes, a test-case shall first be tried in the Court of Claims.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
JAMES N. BURNES,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The report of the committee of conference shows as the result of the action of the conferees on the part of the Senate that they have insisted in every instance upon twenty-three of the amendments disagreed to by the House. My colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] and I have conferred, but we were not able to see the third conferee on the part of the House. However a majority of the conferees on the part of the House have not felt disposed to disagree to the amendments in bulk and insist upon a disagreement to all the amendments in controversy, but have selected some of them to be advised upon by a vote of the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], in pursuance of that understanding, will indicate the few amendments which we thought the House should express its opinion upon; and it is possible that the House may be willing, in order to save time, to remit the balance, as it is likely they can be arranged in conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman alludes to the amendments of the Senate not disposed of?

Mr. RANDALL. I allude to a part of those that were disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee of conference must be first disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report be agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] inform the House whether any amendment still in controversy involves the payment of the clerks of Senators?

The SPEAKER. That matter will come up after the report has been agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that question when I have an opportunity.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] I will say that Senate amendment numbered 101, which gentlemen can refer to in the bill printed with the Senate amendments, is as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $33,482.

That is for miscellaneous items of the Senate contingent fund. The conferees were unable to agree on that item, for it was frankly stated that the appropriation was intended to pay the clerks of Senators.

Mr. CALKINS. They were to be paid from that appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; they were to be paid from that appropriation. The subject was discussed; I am not at liberty to say what occurred in the conference. But I am at liberty to say that I suggested that the Senate should put in language distinct and clear the object for which this appropriation was designed, so as not to have it simply classified as miscellaneous. Notwithstanding my suggestions, the amendment comes back with a disagreement. That is all I am at liberty to say.

Mr. CALKINS. With the permission of my chairman I will indicate the amendment in regard to which I shall ask the House to recede from its disagreement.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman desire much time for debate?

Mr. CALKINS. Very few minutes will be sufficient on my part.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the debate will be confined as much as possible to the matters directly involved, as there are other bills to follow this.

Mr. CALKINS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, and 8, and also from the amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments of the Senate indicated, and also the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana to the amendment numbered 9.

The Clerk read amendments numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, as follows:

5. For court-house and post-office, Des Moines, Iowa: One-half cost of paving alley around building, $514.42.

6. For custom-house and post-office, Hartford, Conn.: One-half cost of paving between city hall and custom-house, $892.46.

7. For court-house and post-office, Jersey City, N. J.: Paving Washington street adjacent to building, $244.

8. For old custom-house, Saint Louis, Mo.: Paving Third street front, $1,041.74; paving Olive street front, $946.49.

9. For court-house and post-office, Grand Rapids, Mich.: Regrading, repaving, and sewering on Lyon and North Division streets, $1,491.53.

The amendment of Mr. CALKINS to Senate amendment numbered 9 was read, as follows:

Add to amendment numbered 9 the following:

For court-house and post-office at Springfield, Ill., paving Monroe street, $870.85.

Mr. CALKINS. I shall be very brief in making my explanations to the House in reference to these amendments. There are two antagonistic views held by myself and the chairman of my committee. I maintain that while the Government of the United States holds this ground by deed or conveyance as any other proprietor holds land, there is a condition annexed which we require of the States, that no tax or burden shall be laid by the State upon the ground which is owned by the United States for this purpose.

There is no disagreement between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and myself with reference to the power of States or municipalities to tax or burden this property of the United States. I hold, and so does he, as I understand, that it is not within the power of the States or municipalities to tax or burden this property in such a way that it may be sold as the property of private individuals may be for the non-payment of taxes. But I hold, that as the Government of the United States has accepted this property as an owner and as all citizens whose property abuts upon the streets adjacent to these public buildings can be compelled by the State or municipality to pay for improving the streets to the center, subject to the penalty of having their property sold for the tax if they refuse to pay it, the Government of the United States ought not as a proprietor to insist that because of the stipulation that the property of the Government shall not be subjected to any tax or burden by State authority therefore the Government will not pay for paving to the center of the streets in front of its property. In other words, having forced the citizens who owned private property to submit to an assessment to pay the cost of paving to the center of the street, the great Government of this country should not set itself up and say, "We refuse to bear any part of the expense of paving the streets upon which our property abuts."

I admit that under the law the Government can not be compelled to bear any part of this expense; but I say the Government should pay its fair share as a matter of right and justice. The private owner whose property abuts upon the streets can be compelled to pay for paving to the center; and the Government, although it can not be compelled to pay in the same way, should step in and say, "We require nothing of the private citizen that we are not ready and willing to do ourselves."

That is my proposition; there is where I stand. I say that in justice, in fair dealing and honesty, in common decency we should do this. If the Government stands out and says, "We will pay no part of the expense of making pavements or building sewers," then you may have one-half the streets upon which the Government property abuts unpaved; you may have no sewerage; you may have your buildings isolated entirely from the improvements of the cities where they are located.

I wish to add that in many cases —I have not a statement of them in detail, but I believe the gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has a statement in regard to a number of cases—the Government has borne its share of these expenses. The Forty-fifth Congress appropriated $9,000 to pay for paving in front of the arsenal in the city of Indianapolis in my own State.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. To what extent?

Mr. CALKINS. It paid the expense to the center of the street.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Was it beyond the sidewalk?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir; beyond the sidewalk. In Chicago also this expense has been paid by the Government in eight or ten cases, the particulars of which the gentleman from Missouri has before him. That is all I want to say on the legal proposition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to answer in advance one of the objections which has been urged against this proposition. The objection is that these cities where our public buildings are located, having the benefit of these establishments, ought to do this paving themselves. Now, if we had not purchased the land and erected these buildings, in order that the business of the Government might be transacted there, the objection might have some force. But the reasonable presumption is that the Government purchased the ground and erected the buildings for its own interests, and I think it is begging the question to say that because the erection of these buildings has added to the value of other property in the vicinity, therefore the citizens should pay all the expenses of street improvements.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Was it not the purpose of the Government in erecting these buildings to accommodate the citizens of the town or city where the buildings are located; and ought not that to be inducement enough for the citizens to pay for the pavement of the streets?

Mr. CALKINS. Before answering my friend from Illinois I want to make a statement of fact which I think ought to have great weight in the determination of this question.

Take a case (which is certainly a supposable case, and which I understand from my friend from Missouri is actually the fact in the city of Saint Louis) where by constitutional provision a municipality is prohibited from making any expenditure of money beyond a certain limit; and where an expenditure up to the constitutional limit is demanded in order to meet the expenses of the city. There is no general fund which can be appropriated for the paving of streets if the property owners fail to meet the assessment. The municipality is obliged in this respect to depend entirely upon the assessments made upon the owners of abutting property. But if the Government of the United States, whose property thus abuts upon the streets requiring to be paved, refuses to bear any part of this expense no assessment of course can be enforced against it. The city can not make an appropriation from its own treasury to meet this expenditure, because there is a constitutional inhibition. Hence if payment be not made by the Government of the United States the amount must go unpaid.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is not my friend aware that when the Government locates a post-office or other public building in Saint Louis, or any other city, the value of adjacent property is thereby largely enhanced?

Mr. CALKINS. My answer is that every building erected in the city of Saint Louis or elsewhere, whether built by the Government or by private individuals, enhances the value of adjacent property. I say that is not a consideration which this Congress should entertain for a moment. In regard to these street improvements, we should not compel private citizens to bear a burden which the Government refuses to bear. We ought not to set ourselves up and, because we have the power, say, "We refuse to make the appropriation."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As far as the streets are concerned, if not the sidewalks, is not this virtually admitting the power to tax the property of the United States in all cities where public buildings have been located?

Mr. CALKINS. I will not stop to discuss a point of law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it not enforcing the right to tax property of the United States by a State or municipality which at the time of the location of the public building was specially waived?

Mr. CALKINS. I have admitted no State or municipality can lay this burden.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then why shall the tax be paid on United States property?

Mr. CALKINS. It is our duty to do that which we require of every private citizen.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is not my point. When these public buildings were located in these cities was it not expressly provided the Government was not to pay any such tax?

Mr. CALKINS. No; I do not agree they would not ask the Government to do what it ought to do. If the Government ought to build a sidewalk for the purpose of getting to its custom-house and post-office it ought to do so, so men can go there on wheels as well as on foot, for the Government owns to the middle of the street. I now yield to my friend, the chairman of the committee, whatever time he requires.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, we sit in this House as representatives of the several Congressional districts, and we naturally look after their interests rather than to the amount of money to be paid out of the Federal Treasury. That is especially the case, and perhaps natuurally so, in those districts having representatives on this floor where public buildings are located. For myself, I was unwilling either directly or indirectly to admit the right of any State or municipal government to levy a tax upon the property of the United States; when that property had been purchased for and dedicated to public uses upon express terms it should not be subject to taxes or other burdens. I am a layman, but I believe it to be good law that a statute must be construed in its entirety, and not each word as if it stood alone. Now you can not put the same construction upon the word "tax" and the word "burden." They are two words, and they are to be construed together, and in their most comprehensive sense.

Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to admit this right of taxation against Federal property beyond former appropriations—that is, outside of the immediate approaches—then you are going to plunge the Government into a new expenditure of money, which ultimately will be very large. To admit we are bound to pay for one-half of the paving of this street around this public building, it follows of necessity we will be compelled to pay for its repair and maintenance to the extent of their cost.

I have no feeling about this beyond the principle which is involved; and to the adoption of any such new principle I was unwilling the conference committee should agree. If it is to be done, I wanted the Senate and the House in their representative relations to say that the Government of the United States should be taxed in this way. The gentleman from Indiana himself admits there is no power to collect such a tax, and I am quite willing, without another word, to submit the matter to the decision of the House. I shall be bound, of course, by the action the House shall take.

Mr. CALKINS, Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. EATON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the floor?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Missouri wishes to make a correction, and I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. In Saint Louis the expense of repairing and maintaining streets is borne out of the general revenue, and it is only as to the original construction of a street where the expense is levied against the adjacent property.

Mr. RANDALL. But the principle is clear, that if they can tax the property of the United States to the middle of the street it follows of necessity, logically and legally, they can also tax it for one-half of the repair and maintenance of the street. I do not think my friend from Indiana, who is a good lawyer, will controvert that proposition.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman will yield me the floor I will move now to take the vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to yield to my friend from Connecticut for a moment.

Mr. EATON. I agree, Mr. Speaker, with the general principle advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not believe that the streets adjacent to Government property should be paved to the center by the Federal Government.

But there is one item in this bill to which I desire the chairman of the committee to give his attention. I refer to the building of an approach between the city hall and the public building belonging to the United States in my own city of Hartford. No wheels go there. It is simply an approach between what used to be the State-house in Connecticut and the new public building belonging to the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. Does this alley belong to the Government? Is it public property—property of the United States?

Mr. EATON. It is, to the extent of one-half.

Mr. RANDALL. That, of course, presents a different case.

Mr. EATON. That is just the case presented here, and to that I desire to attract the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

But another thing: the city of Hartford does not ask this Congress, nor do the Representatives from the State of Connecticut ask Congress to pave the streets adjacent to our public buildings in that State. We take care of them ourselves, and if my recollection serves me right we gave—we did not sell—one-half of that magnificent public park for this purpose to the United States, a park that was worth $300,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it does not matter so far as the principle is concerned whether the property was given to the United States or purchased by it. The principle involved is the same in either case.

Mr. EATON. But it may be a question of reciprocal generosity on the part of the House. The House may see it in a different light.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I desired to yield a moment to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], but I do not now see him in his seat. I therefore yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

Mr. CALKINS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to the Senate amendment contemplates the paving of one-half of the streets opposite the public building in the city of Springfield, and which has already cost the city $870. The city of Springfield has adopted a general system of paving its streets, and has levied an assessment upon the adjacent property to pay for that paving to the center of the street. That system is now in operation in that city, and I am painfully aware of the existence of such a law from the fact of having just received notice that my own homestead has been assessed over $2,000 to pay the cost of building pavements in front of it for the benefit of other people, for I am not there.

This is not an ordinary tax for the support of the Government of the State or the municipal government, but it is a tax for the repair, preservation, and building of the approaches to the Government property, and is not levied against the property at all, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania assumes. But the city has come to the Government and asked the Government, which is rich and able to pay its portion of the burden of keeping up the building and its approaches, as well as private individuals, to do just exactly what the owners of other property are doing in the city. It asks the Government to do in Springfield just what it has already done in Indianapolis, Chicago, and even in Springfield on the other side of this very same building. All has been paid for by the Government in those cases.

When this pavement was being put down I was in Springfield, and the Senators of the United States from that State were also present, and we gave assurances, under the precedents established heretofore on the other side of the court-house in Springfield, and also in Chicago and elsewhere, that this money expended by the citizens should be refunded by the Government of the United States.

Now, as to the general principles involved in making this payment. I insist, while the Government should not be assessed by State and municipal authorities for the support of State or municipal governments, yet that this is entirely a different system of taxation and only obliges the Government as the owner of property to do what other owners of property are required to do in reference to these repairs.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], if he desires it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this question involves a principle to which the Government ought not to be committed. It certainly is a tax and nothing but a tax. Property is taxed to make sidewalks and streets.

The Government owns this property. This is a proposition to subject that property to taxation for the purpose of constructing sidewalks and also paving the streets. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has said, if the Government is to be taxed to make them it must submit, of course, to a tax to repair and forever maintain them. That is the policy we are committing ourselves to.

Now, who is to be benefited by the construction of these sidewalks? The people of the respective towns and cities. They own them. It is for their benefit, their use; and for this reason the appropriation bills providing for the construction of these buildings—all of them, I think, or all of them I have known anything about—contained the provision exempting the Government from this tax and from all burdens.

Why, sir, if this principle is adopted we must go on and apply it to all the public buildings constructed now or hereafter to be constructed. And one thing you may be sure of: on that principle there will always be good sidewalks in front of the Government buildings if nowhere else in these towns and cities.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

Mr. POTTER. In my judgment this proposition involves a question of serious import. In different cities of this Union different modes of procedure prevail. In the city of Boston, where I have paid taxes for a score of years, the streets are paved by taxation upon the general public and not by assessment. In the city of New York, where I also pay taxes, it is done by a system of assessment upon the abutting proprietors. In other cities throughout the land a different practice will be found prevailing. But in either case and in every case it is understood to be a tax and a burden upon the property.

Why, sir, setting aside technicalities and looking at this not as a mere question of law, but as a question as to the proper relations of the States and cities to the General Government, it is perfectly clear, as it seems to me, that this practice, if it has ever obtained at all, ought to be at once stopped and forever. Why, sir, the use of these streets in front of these public buildings is more important to the people and the business of these cities than almost any other portion of the streets in those cities. They are used and used exclusively by the population, by the owners, and by the business of those cities; and they are getting the best and most important use of them. And when they use them they should pave them. This idea of commencing to lay burdens upon the General Government and our different cities competing in that direction should not for a moment be thought of.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. There is a small item in this bill for the paving of a street around the Federal court-house and post-office at Des Moines, Iowa. Over this street come all the mails from some twenty-eight mail trains a day, in addition to the other Government business carried on. Heretofore this Congress has appropriated just what the cost of paving was for that portion lying next to the building. There remains this to complete the street paving.

Now, sir, I differ with gentlemen who hold it to be a tax against the United States. They pay so much per yard for the paving to the contractor. To him is issued a certificate for the number of yards; one-half is assessed against the private proprietors abutting on one side of the street. For the half of the paving next to the United States public building he gets no pay unless the United States voluntarily pays the amount, as it did one or two years ago upon another street. It has never been treated by us as a lawful tax against the United States, but as a just claim upon the equity of the United States to do just what the private citizen does and at the same terms that the private citizen pays. And that is just and equitable whatever may be said, and commits the United States to nothing except to do what is reasonable, just, and equitable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. I now move the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. CALKINS. I insist on the motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] demands the previous question on his motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, with an amendment to the ninth amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the previous question being ordered.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote desired on the amendments?

Mr. RANDALL. On the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] there would be no difficulty about the amendment he referred to when that is proved to relate to public property. What I want is to have the principle established.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. CALKINS; and there were—ayes 56, noes 61.

Mr. CALKINS. The division is so close that I must ask for tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the yeas and nays, that the vote of the House may be of record. This involves millions of the public money.

Mr. SPRINGER. I also ask for the yeas and nays, because I want those members who think the United States is a pauper and can not afford to keep its own property in repair to put themselves on record.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to know whether it is constitutional to tax the farmers of Illinois to improve the streets in Des Moines, Iowa?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And I want to know if it is constitutional to make false statements on this floor.

The SPEAKER (rapping). Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 51 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 66, nays 115, not voting 143; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CALKINS was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. CRISP with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for this day, except on Mexican pension bill and Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. WELLBORN, for to-day.

Mr. GRAVES with Mr. COSGROVE, on this vote.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am paired with a gentleman from Pennsylvania, but on the advice of one of his colleagues I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion; and

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments, not disposed of by the report of the committee on conference, to the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALKINS. I now move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. Except by consent, the amendments not disposed of by the report of the committee of conference must be considered in their regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. After two or three of those amendments have been voted upon, if there be no call for a separate vote on any of the other amendments, I can expedite matters by moving that the House further insist upon its disagreement to all of the amendments in gross.

Mr. CALKINS. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following:

"(22) To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the amount paid for expenses of the commission appointed to go to Louisiana, April, 1877, $3,950.73."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate just read, and agree to the same.

Mr. CALKINS. I will detain the House but a moment with an explanation of this amendment. I know that I am treading upon very dangerous ground in calling the attention of the House to it.

The purpose of this amendment is to reimburse President Hayes for the amount of money expended by him in the payment of the expenses of General HAWLEY of Connecticut, Governor Brown of Tennessee, Mr. MacVeagh of Pennsylvania, Mr. Lawrence of Illinois, and Justice Harlan, then of Kentucky, as a committee to proceed to Louisiana at a time when there were dual State governments in that State for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and reporting thereon to him. The Constitution of the United States requires that the President shall take care that the laws shall be executed. In cases where he can not himself go I know of no other way in which he can obtain information except by selecting and sending persons to inquire and advise him. Predicated upon that portion of the Constitution, these men were selected and did perform a service which resulted in the turning of the government of Louisiana over to the Nicholls régime. Those gentlemen were paid by President Hayes, and ever since that time Congress has been asked to appropriate money to reimburse him.

I will say that if it had been in reference to any other subject, upon which the minds of the people were less excited, or upon which there was less partisan prejudice, I take it there would be no difficulty in securing this appropriation. I think that to-day, being near the end of this session, the minds of members will be in such a frame that they will be willing to do justice by the appropriation of this money to pay for that which resulted so beneficially to some of my friends on the other side of the House.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and ask him when he gets through to call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I admit that the commission referred to resulted in great good, giving that portion of the people of Louisiana who had carried the election in the State control of the State government. Yet I must recognize the fact that this is a debt which was contracted without authority of law. While, if not acting in an official relation, I would be glad to say that Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes should be remunerated, still, acting as a legislator and as a conferee on this bill, I felt bound to report, as I have done, in favor of a disagreement to this amendment, subject of course to the will of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us take up a collection for Hayes.

Mr. CALKINS. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CALKINS that the House recede from its disagreement to the twenty-second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, the motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 37, noes 75.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. There are three other amendments which we have decided to submit to a vote of the House—the forty-seventh, forty-eighth, and forty-ninth amendments.

The amendments were to insert the following new paragraphs:

To pay the Harlan and Hollinsworth Company for the use and occupation of their ship-yard by the ironclad Amphitrite, and the care of said vessel, and expenses to which they were subject for watching and storage of turrets, pilot-houses, guns, &c., from July 8, 1876, to December 29, 1882, $67,987.

To pay William Cramp & Sons for the use and occupation of their ship-yard by the ironclad Terror, and for care and storage of the turrets, guns, &c., from July 8, 1876, to December 30, 1882, $75,790.

To pay John Roach for the use and occupation of his ship-yard by the ironclad Puritan, and for the care of said vessel, and storage of her turrets, guns, &c., from July 8, 1876, to December 29, 1882, $69,201: Provided, That no moneys hereby appropriated for the above three mentioned ships shall be paid except upon full receipt and discharge of all claims of the parties to whom the same may be paid for care and storage of said vessels, turrets, guns, &c., for use and occupation of these several yards.

Mr. CALKINS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to these amendments and agree to the same with an amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the paragraph providing for the payment of William Cramp & Sons the following: To pay Phineas Burgess for the use and occupation of his ship-yard by the ironclad Monadnock, and for the care of said vessel and storage of her turrets, guns, &c., from July 8, 1876, to November 15, 1883, $65,650.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, there are in this bill four items providing payment to four different persons for storage and care of the four monitors for several years past. I will state the manner in which this question is presented. At the last session of Congress it was provided by law in the naval appropriation act:

And the Secretary of the Navy shall take possession of the double-turreted ironclads, and if he thinks best, remove the same to the Government navy-yards; and he shall ascertain the amounts which ought to be paid to the contractors severally for the use and occupation of their yards with said ships and for the care thereof, and report the same, with all the facts connected therewith, to Congress.

The Secretary of the Navy under this law appointed a board, consisting of three naval officers, whose inquiry on this subject has not been in any way disputed, nor has any reflection been cast upon them. This board reported to the Secretary of the Navy the compensation which each of these parties ought to receive for occupancy of parts of their yards by these vessels and for the care of them, including the hiring of watchmen whom they were obliged to hire, and also the repairs necessary to be made upon each of these vessels during the time they were in these yards. The report made by this board to the Secretary of the Navy was sent to Congress with his recommendation that an appropriation be made in accordance with the law and with the report which had been made for the payment of these amounts.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I need say nothing further on that subject. The amounts are due. The sums to which these parties are entitled have been ascertained. They ought to receive their money. The only question is when we shall pay them. I think these amounts should be paid now.

I want to make one further suggestion. It is said that this is a mere claim. I reply that it is not a claim in the ordinary acceptation of the term, because under the law the Secretary of the Navy was required to ascertain the amounts due to these parties. He has ascertained the sum due and it has become a settled matter under the law. We ought to appropriate the money.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman say that this board had authority to determine finally the extent of the liability of the Government in this matter?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir. But in the absence of any dispute as to the amounts properly due, I say that we ought to pay them.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, in 1874 the contracts were made for these double-turreted monitors. As the circumstances of the several cases are substantially the same, I will refer to but one vessel, the Amphitrite. This vessel was begun in 1874. It was put upon the ways. In July, 1876, the Government stopped all work upon the vessel, which then remained upon the slip of the Harlan and Hollingsworth Company at Wilmington, Del., for more than six years—from July, 1876, to December, 1882. The use of this slip thus occupied during that time by this vessel was worth to this company, and they could have easily made from its use, $20,000 a year, which would have been for six and a half years $130,000. By the fact that the vessel remained there they were prevented from taking other contracts In addition to the space which it occupied, they had to take care of the vessel, to see that it was kept in proper condition. I state upon the authority of Mr. J. Taylor Gause, one of the purest and best men I think in the entire country, that by the use of that slip during these six and a half years the company could have made $130,000. Then, as I have said, there was the expense of watchmen, and, more than that, the company was prevented from taking other contracts. The vessel was an obstruction in their yard.

In December, 1882, a new contract was made by the Government, under which the vessel was launched, and since that time the Government has been paying for wharfage for these vessels at the rate of $8 a day, which would be about $3,000 a year.

I desire to emphasize the statement that the amount proposed to be paid by this bill to these people is not one-half of what they could have made if these vessels had not remained in their yards, and which they were prevented from making by reason of the obstruction which the vessels caused. The amount of the claim is what has been fixed by the Government. These people had no voice in it. At the suggestion of the last Congress three commissioners were appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. They fixed the price. They discounted that price 25 per cent. The Secretary of the Navy now says it is a low and reasonable price.

The Government has fixed a low price for what has been done by these ship-yards. They all stand on the same basis. It is an amount ascertained by the Government. It is a low amount. It is only just it should be paid by the Government, and in this bill. I do not think I need add one word more. I believe this Congress is actuated by proper motives and that they will do that which is right or at least within 25 per cent. of it.

Mr. RANDALL. The amount involved in the matter immediately under consideration is a quarter of a million of money. I do not know that I dissent from the statement made by the two gentlemen who have spoken in relation to it. But these are claims. They grow out of certain contracts made in relation to the monitors, and there is no reason why these claims should be taken out of the current course of legislation in this House and attached to the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not true that these vessels went into these ship-yards under contract by the Secretary of the Navy to repair and reconstruct those vessels when there was no appropriation of money and when there was an inhibition in the law to make any such contract? Is it not further true they remained year after year when Congress with its attention specially called to it refused to make appropriation therefor?

Mr. RANDALL. The very question which the gentleman asks shows the propriety of these claims being considered in a full and deliberate way instead of being inserted in the deficiency appropriation bill at the other end of the Capitol. I am not fully able to answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia. As I understand it these claims for wharfage and rent arose between the period when the Government stopped the contract on these monitors and subsequently when Congress authorized the placing of engines in them, a period of six years and a half. If the gentleman from Indiana, who advocates this mode of disposing of these claims, can answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia I should be glad to have him do so. With many others I have not had full opportunity to examine into every particular of these claims. Not having the matter immediately under consideration I have not given it that attention, perhaps, it ought to have had from me. As I have not been in favor of the allowance, I am free to say I should be glad to hear it discussed.

Mr. CALKINS. What was the question of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not true when these vessels were taken to these ship-yards they were carried there under contract for work to be done on them when no money was appropriated by law for the purpose, and when the law declared there could be no contract unless appropriation had been previously made? Did not the Forty-fourth, Forty-Fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, when this matter was brought before them, refuse to make any appropriation for work to be done under these contracts because they were illegal? Did not the minority of the last House stand in the way of anything being done in that matter?

Mr. CALKINS. The matters we are now considering have nothing to do with the damages these parties claim they suffered by violation of the contracts they made for completing the monitors, and which are due and unadjusted. The point of difference between these parties and the discussion which arose in previous Congresses was as to the amount of damages they sustained by Congress refusing to make appropriation of money to carry out the contracts they claim covered the completion of these monitors. They laid claim for damages against the Government, not only for the rent and occupation of their yards and all that as a part of the damages, but they laid claim against the Government for damages for a breach of contract. Now, that claim is not included here at all.

The last Congress took this view of the case: As the Government of the United States had these four monitors upon the stocks, occupying a part of the yards of these ship-builders who had gone on and made repairs upon them, covering them in to protect them from the weather, painted them when necessary, appointed watchmen to take care of them so as to prevent them from deteriorating, and performed such service and such duty as they thought it proper to do to prevent them from rotting on the stocks, that therefore it was proper to look into the question of the occupancy of these yards by the vessels; and these items to which I have referred, that is to say the rent of the yards, the care of the vessels and their storage, were the items that the board was ordered to investigate and make a report to the Secretary of the Navy, leaving the question of damages and of the violation of the contracts entirely out of the question. This was the view the last Congress took of the matter.

These questions of damages are questions of claims to be considered and investigated by that committee, but the question now presented for the rent and occupation of the yards and the payment of the men who took care of the vessels and kept them from deteriorating and being destroyed presents an entirely different question, which was referred to the Secretary of the Navy by the law of last year to investigate and report upon it. Pursuant to that law and authority he appointed a board composed of three officers of the Navy, consisting of Captain Johnson, Commander Schley, and Naval Constructor Hichborn to go to these yards and ascertain the amounts which ought to be paid to the contractors for the use and occupation of the same. These officers performed that duty and on the 8th of January last made their report. I am informed that in some cases these men owning the ship-yards had to borrow money to bear the expenses which these monitors and their care imposed upon them. So that the question the gentleman from Georgia asks is not applicable at all to this subject.

The questions of damages are all outside. The great question we have to consider here is as to whether we shall pay the amount which is due to these men for the purposes I have indicated.

If the gentleman from Georgia now desires any time, I will yield to him for a few minutes. I will then ask a vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to have two or three minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not see the distinction that the gentleman from Indiana has presented. The position taken by the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses and the minority of the last House was that everything done in connection with these vessels grew out of an unlawful contract; that they were taken into the yards of these ship-builders when there was no provision of law authorizing it. Congress refused all the time to do anything with them. They were kept there; and there was no effort on the part of these people to relieve themselves of the burden of keeping them; but they were hoping evidently to keep them until some favorable opportunity would arise to make a contract for their completion. That was the view that was taken by these Congresses.

Mr. CALKINS. The view that I tried to impress upon the gentleman from Georgia does not embrace the question of the completion of the vessels at all. Just let me read him a sentence from this report which will make it clear:

> The board appointed by your order of the 20th of November, a copy of which is herewith appended marked A, to ascertain and report to the Department the amounts which ought to be paid to the contractors for the use and occupation of their yards by the double-turreted ironclads Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror, and for the care thereof, has the honor to report, &c.

That is the subject I have just been discussing. So that the only thing included was for the rent, occupation, and space the monitors occupied in these yards and the care that was necessary to be taken of them; that is, the actual outlay that these men were required to make to keep them from being destroyed or from deteriorating.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is just the one point I have been making, that the occupation by these vessels of these yards grew out of an illegal contract, that they should never have gone into the yards in the first instance, and that it was an attempt to force upon Congress an appropriation of money under these contracts for their care or completion which it had refused.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. With reference to whether the contracts were illegal or not is a question not involved here. The only question is that these vessels occupied the space in the yards without reference to any contract. They were there and were cared for by these people. They were our property; and I wish to ask the gentleman whether he would consent to the occupation by the Government of private premises without remuneration? Does the gentleman think it right to do that?

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that the presence of these vessels, whatever damages grew out of it to those ship-yard owners, arose out of the contracts, and these parties themselves knew it to be illegal when they carried the vessels into their yards. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that it was made within a few days before the term of office of the then Secretary expired. There was no money in the Treasury to pay for it.

Mr. LORE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he not think that the Government is estopped from denying this claim for the care and preservation of these vessels from the fact that they were put there by the then officers of the Government, that they remained there as Government property without question, and that the Congress of the United States authorized these vessels to be finished so far as to launch them? That being the case, is it not true that the Government is estopped now from making this objection that the gentleman now sets up?

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say if the last Congress saw fit to make a contract, whatever contract they made at any time we are bound by. But when an unlawful contract was made by the Department we refuse to regard it; and if those vessels were continued there under the unlawful contract we are not bound by it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana occupied part of my time.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now the gentleman from Indiana says that Congress authorized the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board for the purpose of ascertaining what the damage to these parties was——

Mr. CALKINS. Not the damage.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, the facts as to the occupation of the yards.

Mr. CALKINS. And the money the parties had paid out themselves.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not complaining of the present Secretary of the Navy for appointing that board. He did exactly what the law required him to do. The board made an investigation and reported. But I go beyond that. I believe that this whole matter is a pure claim; and I believe there is scarcely anything in it. Some of the items I might be willing to allow. But I think we owe it to ourselves to let this take its course as a claim as all other claims do. Let it go to a committee; let it be reported to this House; and let it be debated and acted upon by itself. A claim for damages that have occurred in this way is entitled to no high privilege of riding through this House on an appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Georgia seems quite familiar with the facts. My memory is not altogether exact in regard to them; but it seems to me those contracts were made conditioned upon appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. They were.

Mr. RANDALL. And conditioned upon approval of the Secretary.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not desire to recur to private conversations. But if the gentleman from Indiana will allow me another moment, I wish to say that at the time that contract was made, within two or three days or a week, or at least a very short period, before the then Secretary of the Navy went out of office, I happened to have charge of the naval appropriation bill, and he called my attention to the fact that the contract had been made; and it was distinctly understood they had no power; it all depended on whether an appropriation was made or not as to all of them. Mr. Roach was, I think, the only person contracted with.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLOUNT. There may have been one or two others. Congress did not make the appropriation, and refused to do so year after year. And yet the work on the vessels was continued in those yards. And here is this claim.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say one word in reply. The original contracts made with these parties, as has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Georgia, were conditional contracts. But the hulls of the vessels were constructed; they were there. There was our property. That is the fact about it. Then Congress came in and undertook to annul those contracts and refused to make further appropriations. How did that leave them? It left the hulls of those vessels in these yards, and there they remained occupying that space; and in such a condition they needed care. And Congress did not make sufficient appropriations to afford proper care.

Mr. BLOUNT. Congress was never asked for that. It was constantly asked for appropriations under those contracts.

Mr. CALKINS. It was asked for appropriations to finish the vessels, and Congress would not give it. But these parties expended their money in taking care of the vessels. We passed a law by which we took three of these vessels under new contracts, recognizing the validity of the old contracts, and put armor on them, and they are now taken away from these yards. But there they were for several years in the possession of these men, occupying this space, and they paying their money out for their proper care.

There is not a man who will rise on this floor and say that this should not be paid. It is only said that it ought to go to the Committee on Claims. We all know what that means. That is a mausoleum, a tomb, where this matter would be buried, and from which it would never be resurrected. But here the board has reported the amount that ought to be paid. Nobody disputes that we owe it. Let us now have a vote.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow——

Mr. CALKINS. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 47, 48, and 49, and agree to the same, with an amendment to number 49.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 71.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no other separate vote asked for, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate not heretofore disposed of.

Mr. DIBRELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the Senate committee insist on amendment numbered 110 to strike out the provision repealing the appropriation of $25,000 to the Agricultural Department?

Mr. RANDALL. They do. This was an amendment inserted in the bill in the House, if I remember rightly, at the instance of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL].

Mr. DIBRELL. It was unanimously agreed by the Agricultural Committee in framing the appropriation bill that if the pleuro-pneumonia bill passed this provision should be stricken out of the appropriation bill. The appropriation bill passed before the pleuro-pneumonia bill. In the committee of conference a motion was made to strike this provision out. But it was suggested by Mr. HALE and Mr. CALL, two of the conferees on the part of the Senate, that it was better to strike it out by an amendment on this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. In obedience to the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture that was inserted, and after full advisement of the propriety of the action recommended by that committee the House conferees insisted upon it. I think it can be adjusted in conference.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] with regard to the item of $25,000, that we do not need it now. That feature, taking care of the quarantine, is in some other bill, is it not?

Mr. RANDALL. It is in the pleuro-pneumonia bill, I think.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. At least we do not need it here.

Mr. RANDALL. I move now that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate not disposed of and ask a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. CALKINS.

CLAIM OF CHEROKEE INDIANS, ETC.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the claim of the Cherokee Indians residing east of the Mississippi River at the date of the treaty of 1835, as set forth in the report to Congress of the Secretary of the Interior, February 3, 1883, and made under act of August 7, 1882, and contained in Senate Executive Document No. 60, of the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, or such sum or sums as may be found due to them, either legally or equitably, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, disposition, and report, as provided by the Cherokee treaties of 1835, 1836, and 1846, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine the rights of all parties interested therein; and that in the hearing and determination of this suit, and also in the hearing and determining of a certain other suit now pending before said Court of Claims, and known as cause No. 13828 on the docket of said court, the judges thereof are hereby authorized and directed to hear and consider the claim of Belva A. Lockwood for professional and other services rendered and expenses incurred by her in both cases, in aiding the said band of Cherokee Indians and other Indians east of the Mississippi River in prosecuting their rights involved in the said suits, and to determine what amount is justly due to her on account of such services and expenditures, and to make and enter of record in both causes an order that the amount so proved to be due to her shall be paid to her out of such sum or sums as shall be found to be due to said Cherokees from any funds held in trust by the United States for said Cherokee Nation of Indians.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I submit now the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House 7012, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee of conference will be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7012) "making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 28, 49, 50, 57, 59, 60, 62, 71, 72, 79, 82, 84, 88, 107.

Amendment numbered 19: That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 19, with an amendment as follows: Omit the part struck through and insert the following: "Provided, That no part of said money shall be so expended until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that the Buffalo Bayou Ship-Channel Company has relinquished or abandoned to the United States, forever, all their franchises and any and all right to collect or impose tolls or charges for any part of said ship-channel or Buffalo Bayou;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 80: That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 80, with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "improvement," before the word "thirty-five," the words "and survey;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 83: That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 83, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "dredge" and in lieu thereof insert "snag;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 85: That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out "preventing erosion" and insert in lieu thereof "the protection;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 58, 61, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 81, 86, 87, 89, 90, 91, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107½, 108, 109, 110, 111, 113, 114, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after "Wisconsin" the words "continuing improvement;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 46: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: "Strike out "and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 105: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "two," after "million," and insert "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 106: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 106, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all the last proviso and insert in lieu thereof as follows: "Provided further, That in view of the threatened injury to the harbor of Memphis and the Government property at that place, and the necessity of immediate protection thereof, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be immediately applied to protect said harbor and property, out of the foregoing appropriation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 112: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of part stricken out: "That out of the money herein appropriated for the Kentucky River the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended for the purchase of land for the construction of lock and dam at Beattyville; and so much thereof as may be necessary may also be expended for the same purpose at lock No. 6;" and the Senate agree to the same.

And provided further, That the sum of $6,000 authorized by the act approved June 14, 1880, to be expended for the removal of dams in Yadkin River, North Carolina, may be used by the Secretary of War for acquiring the right of way by removal or otherwise of such dams as may be necessary for the contemplated improvement, the said right of way or removal to be obtained by agreement with the parties interested, or in event of failure to make a reasonable agreement by condemnation as provided for by the laws of the State of North Carolina.

Amendment numbered 115: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 115, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of part stricken out: "That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to prescribe such rules and regulations in respect to the use and administration of the Des Moines Rapids Canal, the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, and the Louisville and Portland Canal as in his judgment the public interest may require, which rules and regulations shall be posted in some conspicuous place for the information of the public. Any person knowingly and willfully violating such rules and regulations shall be liable to fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, to be enforced in any district court of the United States within whose territorial jurisdiction such offense may have been committed;" and the Senate agree to the same.

THOS. J. HENDERSON,
Managers of conference on the part of the House.

S. J. R. McMILLAN,
O. D. CONGER,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers of conference on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement in writing accompanying the report will now be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The bill as it passed the House appropriated $12,086,200; as amended and reported back from the Senate it amounts to $13,584,700.

The net amount added in the conference is $315,000.

The bill as agreed upon in conference and now reported to the House for its action amounts to $13,899,700, an increase over the bill as it passed the House of $1,813,500.

The Senate had incorporated a clause with reference to Memphis, which appropriated one-fifth of the whole amount set apart for the lower Mississippi. The Senate receded from this amendment by reducing the amount from $250,000 to $100,000 and adding an additional $100,000, making the total for Memphis $200,000. It was stated that the custom-house was in danger, and this fact was considered in arriving at a conclusion.

The Senate increased the appropriation for the Potomac River $250,000. The House conferees finally agreed to this. The remaining important amendments of the Senate were for Gedney's channel, at New York, $200,000; mouth of the Columbia River, $100,000; Hell Gate, $60,000; Black Warrior River, Alabama, $50,000; Brazos Santiago, Tex., $25,000; Savannah, $50,000; Norfolk Harbor, $50,000; Buffalo, N. Y., $25,000; Baltimore, $50,000; Cape Fear River, North Carolina, $125,000; Santee River, South Carolina, $15,000; Detroit River, $100,000. The House had appropriated for most of the above-named localities, and the sums here named are in addition.

The House appropriations stricken out by the Senate were all restored, amounting in the aggregate to $365,500.

The general legislation contained in the bill was changed in a few particulars.

The Missouri River Commission was increased from three to five members.

The plan for obtaining twenty-two feet at mean low tide on the James River was adopted as the House had agreed upon.

The amendment of the Senate in regard to protection of navigation by booms, dikes, and other guarding structures was accepted by the House conferees.

ALBERT S. WILLIS,
N. C. BLANCHARD,
THOS. J. HENDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. WILLIS. On that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson;
A bill (H. R. 137) for the relief of Becky A. Mower;
A bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins;
A bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll;
A bill (H. R. 284) for the relief of Mary G. Hawk;

A bill (S. 2350) granting a pension to Anna Ginn.

PENSIONS FOR MEXICAN WAR, ETC.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] for the previous question upon his motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, to the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes. Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. When the question was last taken no quorum voted. The Clerk will again call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 9, not voting 180; as follows:

Mr. MATSON. My colleague, Judge HOLMAN, requested me to state that he is detained in a conference committee, as are also the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HANCOCK, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON.

The SPEAKER. That has been already stated.

Mr. HANBACK. I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SNYDER], but voted to make a quorum. I withdraw my vote.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. LAWRENCE with Mr. ERMENTROUT, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. OCHILTREE with Mr. GREEN, on all political questions, for to-day.

Mr. POLAND with Mr. TUCKER, on this vote.

Mr. DORSHEIMER with Mr. MILLARD, on all political questions, for the remainder of this session.

Mr. HARDEMAN with Mr. MCCORMICK, on all political questions, until further notice.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 135, the nays 89. No quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move a call of the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We will vote it down.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make a proposition, which I think may be agreed to on both sides. There are three points touching the pension laws, which, with the exception of one, have been agreed to by the committees of this House and by the House, and two have been agreed to by the Senate——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order. Let us vote down the motion of the gentleman from Alabama and go on with the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will hear my proposition. It is made in good faith, and I think will be accepted.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House adjourn. [The question having been put.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 31 in the affirmative—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 36, nays 138, not voting 150; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call Mr. TULLY was announced as paired with Mr. HART.

Mr. BEACH moved that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

INTERNAL-REVENUE PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. MCMILLIN submitted the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same amended to read as follows: In line 5, strike out "two" and insert "three," and at the end of said line 5 add "in all cases where the penalty prescribed may be imprisonment in the penitentiary, and within two years in all other cases."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an addifional proviso at the end of said amendment as follows: "And provided further, That this act shall not apply to offenses committed by officers of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

BENTON MCMILLIN,
WM. C. OATES,
SERENO E. PAYNE,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JOHN SHERMAN,
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany the report of conferees on H. R. 6370.

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 6370 "to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Amendments 1, 3, 4, and 5 are merely verbal, and do not change the nature of the bill.

Amendment No. 2, as agreed upon in conference, changes the bill as passed by the House so that the statute is not changed as against officers of the Government. If the bill passes as agreed upon by the conferees it will reduce the time within which offenders may be prosecuted for violating internal-revenue laws from five years to three years where the penalty is imprisonment in the penitentiary, and two years in all other cases instead of five, as is now law.

The effect of the sixth amendment will be to compute the time of the running of the statute of limitations from the commission of the offense to the institution of proceedings before a commissioner or grand jury.

WM. C. OATES.
BENTON McMILLIN.
SERENO E. PAYNE.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. ROSECRANS submitted the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 5709, an act to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, as follows:

In line 3, after the word "army," insert the words "a territorial division or a department."

Also, in No. 2, in line 5, strike out "court-martial" and insert the words "courts-martial," and agree to the same.

W. S. ROSECRANS,
R. M. MURRAY,
T. LYMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
S. B. MAXEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Regular order.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a report to make from the Committee on Claims, which I think ought to be printed for the information of the House, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the demand for a few moments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it leads to no debate, I have no objection. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. McMILLIN. It is a report to which I think there will be no objection. It is simply a statement of the claims that have been referred under the Bowman act by the Committee on Claims to the Court of Claims, and all are interested in knowing what they are. If there be no objection I will make the report now.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave at this time to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on the Public Lands with reference to the bill (H. R. 7495) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland, in Oregon, to the Central Pacific Railroad in California.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged report.

Mr. OATES. I ask leave now to file the views of the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought leave had already been given and therefore stated that it was a privileged report. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OATES. I ask that the views be printed to accompany the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee has been already printed.

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir; but I ask that this be printed with the preceding report and to accompany it.

There being no objection it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to submit a proposition: I propose, Mr. Speaker, that we go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering Senate pension bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not consent to set aside this pending bill for that purpose. [Cries of "Regular order!"] It is a bill that ought to be passed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There are about twelve or fifteen of these bills.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the gentleman from Alabama is not in order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois has objected.

The SPEAKER. Various gentlemen on the other side have objected.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am sorry the other side have objected. This is a——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 9 o'clock. I am informed that the conferees on the legislative appropriation bill desire the House to meet at that time for the purpose of agreeing upon their report. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 40.

Mr. MORRILL. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. STORM were appointed tellers.

Mr. PERKINS. Would a parliamentary inquiry be now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Would it be competent to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock to consider private pension bills?

The SPEAKER. It would not while the House is dividing. Of course if the motion to take a recess until 9 o'clock is not agreed to any other motion to take a recess to another hour would be in order.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 125, noes 41.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 9 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 9 o'clock p. m.) resumed its session.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire unanimous consent to pass a little bill—a pension bill—for an old comrade of mine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Regular order!

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

A bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Louisa Le G. Jeffers; and

A bill (S. 1885) to increase the pension of Henrietta A. Lewis, widow of Capt. Robert F. R. Lewis, United States Navy.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, providing for the printing of 2,000 copies of Executive Document 290, first session Forty-third Congress, relative to the irrigation of the San Joaquin and other valleys in California; and also a resolution providing for the printing of the report of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor on the relations between labor and capital, with the accompanying testimony.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The House as the regular order resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate. The pending question is the demand for the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to concur in Senate amendment numbered 6.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to make a proposition. I propose that we go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar so that we may take up Senate pension bills that have been reported by the House committee and are now on the Calendar with a favorable report from the House committee. There are twelve or fifteen of those bills to pension soldiers who were disabled in the service. It seems to me as they have passed the Senate we ought to dispose of them to-night, especially as this evening has been heretofore set apart for pension bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, I will say it has been my earnest desire to pension the Mexican soldiers. I introduced a bill for that purpose, which passed the House and went to the Senate. That bill has been amended in a way, in some respects, that does not meet my approbation, especially as regards those amendments which relate to the Mexican soldiers. But I am satisfied there is no other way by which we can secure the passage of a bill that will benefit those veterans. Therefore I have insisted on proceeding with that bill.

I have made heretofore a reasonable proposition to the gentleman from Alabama, that all the amendments to the bill be non-concurred in and that they be sent to a conference committee, where the bill may meet with final action. That proposition has been declined, and the gentleman has persisted in opposing the passage of the bill by obstructive measures. There remains for me, therefore, only one thing to do, and that is to insist that there shall be action on this bill. I simply desire the majority of this House shall pass its judgment on the bill and its amendments. Certainly that is reasonable and fair.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I submit to every reasonable thinking man on this floor——

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say just a word. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has made a gallant fight to pass this bill. I suggest that we now proceed to pass the bills that have come from the Senate, and not allow this bill to stand in the way of our doing justice to a large number of soldiers and their widows.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this bill is displaced by the bill the gentleman from Indiana speaks of we all know it will be the end of it.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no; let us pass these bills to-night, and we will take that bill up again to-morrow.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to make one remark in reply to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has said.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment numbered 6. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 12, not voting 193; as follows:

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object.

The names of members voting were read.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. RICE, on all political questions, from July 4 until further notice.

Mr. TULLY with Mr. BELFORD, until further notice.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOLMES, until further notice.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON, on all political questions, until July 4.

Mr. BLANCHARD with Mr. GEORGE, for the remainder of this day.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. BISBEE, until further notice.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. CURTIN, on the Mexican-war pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Upon this vote the yeas are 119, and the nays are 12. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] moves that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker count the members of the House present, in order to ascertain whether there is a quorum or not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. All right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a conference report is ready to be submitted, if there is a quorum present. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] asks consent that there be a count of members present by the Chair in order to ascertain if there is a quorum.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think it is unnecessary to resort to these additional filibustering tactics. The question before the House is whether we shall now pass this pension bill or not.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion for a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The Speaker announced the vote by yeas and nays a few moments ago as being less than a quorum; whereupon I moved that there be a call of the House. As I understood, the Speaker put that question, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to put the question when the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] rose and asked consent that there be a count of the members present by the Chair, to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] objected. Then the Chair put the question on the motion for a call of the House, and it was not agreed to by the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Very well. Then I make this point, that no quorum being developed by the last call, nothing is now in order but a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But the House has voted since that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. As I understand it a vote was taken upon ordering the previous question, and the Speaker announced that no quorum had voted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And since then we have had a vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We voted down the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. We have not had another vote by yeas and nays. I make the point that only one motion is in order now, and that is the motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make a motion to adjourn, and the House can vote upon it by tellers or otherwise, and that will disclose whether there is or is not now a quorum present.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not wish to adjourn; I wish to pass this pension bill. I wish to get enough members here to vote upon it and to defeat these filibustering tactics.

The SPEAKER. It makes no difference whether the gentleman desires to adjourn or not; the vote upon the motion to adjourn will disclose whether there is a quorum here or not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. For that purpose I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And pending that motion I wish to finish my point of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] called for the regular order, and I want to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is proceeding in order, and moves that the House adjourn, which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is contending is the only motion now in order.

Mr. POLAND. On the motion to adjourn I call for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers, and there were 43 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were ordered, and Mr. POLAND and Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 1, noes 164.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced agreement in reports of conferences on a bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; and a bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating the internal-revenue laws.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand for the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to concur in Senate amendment numbered 6 to the Mexican pension bill, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I insist on a vote while there is a quorum present, or we may lose it in a few minutes. I want to vote while the Democratic members are here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to inquire if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] can interrupt the regular order at this stage with a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. He can. Under the rules of the House even a motion to adjourn can be interrupted with a conference report.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. Although the committee of conference has not been able to agree upon a portion of the matters in dispute between the two Houses, they have agreed upon most of them, and I submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House 7069, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 9, 10, 13, 26, 32, 33, 36, 37, 39, 40, 46, 47, 48, 49, 67, 74, 75, 76, 110, 111, 119, 120, 121, 142, 143, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 167, 168, 175, 178, 179, 191, 192, 193, 203, 204, 231, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 246, 247, 256, 257, 273, 274, 275, 278, 282, and 283.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 249, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$9,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 250, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$11,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 252, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$9,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 253, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$11,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 261, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert "one clerk at $1,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 262, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "31,060;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 268, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Two additional clerks of class 2;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$112,110;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 280, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$12,060;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 281, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference is unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 21, 24, 25, 27, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, and 212.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement accompanying the report was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the conference report submitted:

The conference committee have agreed upon all of the two hundred and eighty-three amendments of the Senate except twenty-six, which amendments are as follows:

Amendment 21 increases the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses of the Senate from $10,000 to $34,000, and strikes out provision that no part of the money appropropriated by the bill shall be used for clerical services for any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress.

Amendment 27 prohibits the printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of any speech not spoken in the Senate or House of Representatives.

Amendments 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 91, 92, 93, 94, and 95 increase the sum for collectors and deputy collectors of internal revenue from $1,750,000 to $1,850,000, and for salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors $136,000, strike out provisions to reduce the internal-revenue districts to forty-three, the customs collection districts to sixty-nine, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt certain distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operations of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes except as to the payment of the tax, and propose to fix the number of special agents at twenty-five instead of five.

Amendments 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, and 212, relate to an increase of the clerical force in the Pension Office, amounting to $266,900.

The amendments of the Senate added to the bill as it passed the House the sum of $1,087,424.90, of which amount it is agreed by the conference committee that the Senate yield $269,940.

The amendments upon which disagreement is reported involve the sum of $540,900.

The amount yielded by the House by the action of the conference is $276,584.90.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
JOHN HANCOCK,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy but a moment in explaining the effect of this report. As will be seen by an examination of the report and the accompanying statement, the Senate made two hundred and eighty-three amendments to the bill as it passed the House. Those amendments may be classified, not in the order, however, in which they are presented, as follows:

On account of internal-revenue districts and customs districts there was an addition of $136,000, being the result of striking out all the provisions of the House bill for the consolidation of internal-revenue and customs districts, and the reduction of the number of special agents; provisions in regard to pensions in anticipation of the passage of the bill now pending in the House, $266,900, the personnel of the Pension Office being increased to that extent, as was estimated, by the operations of the bill if it should become a law; the addition to the contingent fund of the Senate, $24,000; new offices, increased salaries and contingencies over and above the $24,000, $560,000, making the entire addition to the bill by the two hundred and eighty-three amendments of the Senate, $1,086,900.

The agreement of the conferees covers the entire amendments with the exception of four subjects, which, in the order in which they are in the bill, are:

First. The increase of the contingent fund of the Senate, $24,000, the amendments covering this subject being numbered 21, 24, and 25, and including the striking out of that portion of the House bill which prohibits the use of the contingent fund for the payment of clerical services for Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

Second. The amendment numbered 27, which provides that no speech shall be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless actually delivered in one or the other House of Congress.

Third. The reduction of the number of internal-revenue districts and customs districts and the decrease in the number of special internal-revenue agents to five, the Senate having restored the number to twenty-five. The amendments embracing this subject are numbered from 80 to 95.

The fourth subject which this agreement does not cover is that of pensions, to which I have referred, being embraced in amendments numbered 205 to 212, inclusive.

Those four subjects are left undisposed of by this conference report. All the other matters of disagreement are embraced in the conclusions reached by the conferees and reported to the House. I have not been able to concur in the conclusions reached by the managers on the part of the two Houses; but I do not suppose it would be profitable at this late hour to enter into any statement of my reasons.

The concessions made by the Senate on the $1,086,900 amount to $269,940, which in a material degree is to be deducted from the amounts added to the bill by the Senate for new offices, increased salaries, and contingencies.

If the bill to pension soldiers of the Mexican war (which bill, as amended by the Senate, is now pending before the House) should not be passed, then of course the Senate recedes from the amendments in relation to the subject of pensions, which add to the bill $266,900. As to this particular item touching pensions, covered, as I have remarked, by amendments 205 to 212, the action of the House on this bill is, of course, quite unimportant; for if the bill to which I have just referred should not be passed, then of course the Senate recedes.

Thus, there will be left for further consideration by the House, if this report should be adopted, only three subjects-matter; one, whether the contingent fund of the Senate shall be increased and the proposed limitation stricken out; second, whether the amendment numbered 27, which prohibits the publication of speeches not actually delivered in either House, shall be retained; and third, whether the provision adopted by the House touching the number of internal-revenue districts and customs districts and special agents shall be adhered to.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further statement to make on this subject unless some gentleman desires to propound some inquiry. My colleagues on the conference committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], are both upon the floor. If no gentleman desires to address the House upon the report I will call the previous question.

Mr. STORM. I wish to ask what was done with the fortieth amendment in regard to the painting of the Electoral Commission?

Mr. HOLMAN. That was stricken out by consent.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is necessary for me to speak in detail as to this conference report. It is true, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], that the Senate amendments increased this bill $1,087,000 in round numbers. The Senate has receded to the extent of $269,940, while the House has yielded on those Senate amendments to the extent in the aggregate of $276,584.90.

It is further true the $540,900, as to which there is disagreement, the greater part of it is for force in the Pension Office. There will be no disagreement between the two Houses, as I understand it, but it was not closed up as the conferees were in doubt as to the passage of the present legislation, which has passed the Senate and is now being considered by the House, known as the Mexican pension bill.

The gentleman from Indiana said of this $276,000 the large majority of it comes from the increase of salaries and increase of new offices. The large majority of it, nearly all of it in fact, comes from additional force in the different bureaus of the Executive Departments, and, as I recollect, not to exceed $3,000 of it is for increase of salaries. The increase of clerks is in part in the Second Auditor's Office, which gentlemen will understand the importance of in the settlement of claims of soldiers principally in the late war. There is a slight increase in the First Auditor's Office, which was believed by the Senate to be important, and was concurred in by a majority of the conferees. There is a considerable increase in the Land Office, one-half of the Senate amendments substantially, an increase of forty clerks, believed by the Senate conferees to be important, and also agreed to by the House conferees. There is a considerable increase of, substantially one-half of the Senate amendments, in the Patent Office. The Senate believed the whole increase should be given, but yielded to the House; the House substantially agreeing to one-half of the increase in that office.

I must say I believe the agreements arrived at by the conference committee touching the creation of new offices which the gentleman from Indiana speaks of is an increase, every particle of which is demanded by the exigencies of the service, arising out of the rapid growth of the population and business of the country.

That is all I desire to say in a general way. As we reach the amendments as to which there is still disagreement, I would suggest to my friend from Indiana perhaps that it would be well enough on some, if not on all, to test the sense of the House on a motion to recede on the part of the House. The previous question may cut off explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only propose to call the previous question on the adoption of the conference report. And my friend will see, even if I should call the previous question on the motion to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendments, still the motion to recede from that disagreement would be in order.

Mr. CANNON. The previous question will be called then only on the adoption of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. While I do not agree to the views expressed by my friend touching the necessity of the increase of offices and touching the enlargement of salaries as provided for in this bill, I have not thought at this late hour, under the pressure of public business, I would be justified in consuming the time of the House in presenting reasons. My friend from Illinois and I have had occasion to express our opinions heretofore on the general subject. I will therefore call for the previous question on the adoption of the report of the conference committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the attention of the gentleman for a moment before he demands the previous question. If I understood him correctly there is an item of $200,000 affecting the pension law, being an item of expenditure necessarily involved in the passage of a pension law which is now under consideration. That amount, as I understand, will be appropriated if this bill passes to pension the Mexican soldiers.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no controversy on that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to say that that sum or some such sum will be needed if the bill now under consideration in the House should pass, and that the Senate amendment will not be incorporated if that bill does not become a law.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the present pension bill becomes a law it will require $50,000,000 instead of $200,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If that bill is not passed the Senate is willing to strike out that sum?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is to be left still open and under the control of any conferees that may hereafter be appointed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, it strikes me that there is no necessity for any special hurry about this matter. We had better allow the conference report to wait until after that pension law is enacted or it is otherwise disposed of by the House, and not leave this $200,000 floating around, like Mohammed in his coffin, in mid-air, waiting to see what is to be done with reference to the Mexican pension bill. I repeat, we had better let the conference report wait until we have settled the pension question. That report proposes to settle every thing but that one point, I believe.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; there are four points of difference still open unless the House should otherwise order. I think my friend will find that there will be no trouble about the suggestion he makes.

I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. What action will the gentleman take on the remaining amendments?

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House on the remaining disagreements I now move, in order that the measures may be determined by the action of the House itself if possible, that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 21, 24, and 25. It will be found that they cover the same subject-matter. I ask that these amendments may be reported for the information of the House. Permit me to say first that amendment numbered 25 strikes out the limitation placed by the House upon the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Senate. I ought to say before proceeding further that it will be seen in the Senate amendment numbered 21 that the House appropriated for a certain specific purpose in connection with the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $10,000. That is increased from $10,000 by the Senate to $34,000. The $24,000 added by the Senate, I suppose it is entirely proper to say, renders it necessary, if that should be allowed by the action of the House, that the clause which the House attached providing for the expenditure of that fund shall be stricken out, because the prohibition of the House on the expenditure of that fund prohibited the use of it for the payment of the clerical force to be employed by Senators, Members of the House, or by any Delegate in Congress. That sum of $24,000, I think I may state with propriety, is, as is generally understood on the floor of the House, to be expended for the purpose which the House sought to prohibit by the clause proposed to be stricken out, that is to say, for the payment of clerks employed by the Senators.

Mr. COSGROVE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Suppose that a clerk of a committee should be employed for any purpose by a member of the committee, would it not come within the provision of this act?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all. That is quite a different subject. This is the money appropriated for the contingent fund of the Senate, and the provision was incorporated by the House that it should not be used for the purpose of paying the salaries of clerks or secretaries employed by Senators or members of the House or Delegates.

Inasmuch as it does not prevent my friend from Illinois from making the motion if he desires to make it to recede from this disagreement, I will call the previous question upon the motion.

Mr. HANCOCK. If it be in order, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to these amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to call the previous question if the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wish to be heard for a few moments before that is done.

I presume, Mr. Speaker, that most persons understand just what this $24,000 appropriated in the Senate is intended for. It is for the payment of the clerks employed by some twenty Senators, under a resolution of the Senate, as their private secretaries. I do not myself see that it is particularly objectionable. In fact I think it is entirely proper, if in the judgment and discretion of the Senate they shall deem it necessary that the Senators should have this assistance. The sum, it is true, is a paltry one, but because it is such it does not fail to elicit the principle as fully as if it were greater.

The Senators themselves conceive that they need this character of assistance, and it occurs to me that we might well leave them to judge for themselves upon that point as to what is right and proper in the premises. They are as much responsible to their constituencies as we are, and for one I do not feel called upon to interpose my veto or objection to what they may conceive is necessary to facilitate the public interests confided to their hands. I presume the Senate would hardly interfere if this House in its wisdom should make some provision for certain members who, by reason of their positions in committee, frequently have onerous duties imposed upon them.

It is a fact known to most of the members of this honorable body that many of the members here are under the necessity of employing private clerks and paying for them, it is true, out of their own pockets. It is of course left to them to determine whether they are willing to do that and be satisfied with what remains to them of their salaries, if anything. The Senate might do the same thing, but they elected to do differently; and I am strongly inclined to believe that they elected to do just what is right. It is not their service that is performed in this way so much as it is the service of the whole country; and if the service is such as is expected at their hands, I think it right they should have that assistance to enable them to give that service in the most efficient way. I trust the House will recede from its disagreement to those amendments of the Senate.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I will ask the gentleman from Texas, with his permission, a question before he resumes his seat. Is not the effect of this to increase the salaries of the Senators and to discriminate between the salaries of the members of the House and those of the members of the Senate?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir; it might have that effect indirectly; but not more so than with reference to the $125 allowed to members for postage-stamps, stationery, and things of that kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that is allowed to the Senate also.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to say a word. Of the seventy-eight Senators, Mr. Speaker, thirty, under the resolution of the Senate, employ clerks during the session, each one of them having a clerk at $6 a day, payable out of the contingent fund. Most of the Senators have chairmanships of committees—all of them except those thirty, I believe.

This is the first time that these payments have been made from the contingent fund; this is the commencement of it. The minority of the Senate, whatever party may be in power, shall have this clerical help at the expense of the contingent fund. The Senate, it would be perhaps proper for me to state, is, as I understand it, unanimous upon this proposition; stating at the same time that it is a matter for their own convenience in transacting the public business of the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, which they think ought not to be interfered with by this branch of the Legislature.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Let me complete this sentence. They state at the same time, as I understand, that there is no disposition on their part to interfere in any way with any action the House may take touching this class of expenditure, or any other matter affecting the business of the House. I will now yield for the gentleman's question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there any precedent for the House putting a limitation upon the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Senate? Have we ever before assumed to do it?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. HISCOCK. When?

Mr. CANNON. Time and again as I remember. In the contests some years ago.

Mr. HISCOCK. The question has been upon the creation of offices. But has the question as to the manner in which the Senate shall expend its contingent fund ever been acted upon by the House?

Mr. CANNON. The questions are on all fours so far as that is concerned. I do understand, however, when questions involving the personnel of the Senate have arisen between the House and the Senate the House has yielded.

Mr. PAYSON. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman from Illinois remember that in the Forty-seventh Congress when it was proposed to pay mileage to the Senate the House yielded? My recollection is the other way, and that there never has been a yielding on the part of the House whenever the Senate has proposed to expend its contingent fund in a manner not authorized by law.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the gentleman I was not speaking of mileage.

Mr. PAYSON. But the gentleman's statement was that the House had always yielded on these questions.

Mr. CANNON. That was my recollection, that the House had always yielded on these questions touching the expenditure of the contingent fund and the conduct of the business of the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature. But my colleague's recollection of what took place on the particular matters he has referred to I believe is correct.

Mr. PAYSON. I understood my colleague to say the Senate had never assumed to interfere with the appointment of any of the employés of this body. Is it not true with reference to this very bill that the Senate has made an amendment increasing the pay of the Doorkeeper of the House $500 and has provided for the appointment of two additional clerks to this body?

Mr. CANNON. As my colleague asks these questions out of the line in my remarks——

Mr. PAYSON. I think they are in the precise line of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I will say then, as he asks these questions before I have completed my remarks I will answer them. I will say to the gentleman in justice to the Senate in this matter that the Senate has heretofore and in this bill provided by amendment for the increase of certain salaries of House employés, generally, however, as they state, and as I have no doubt is true, at the suggestion of many members of the House; for the reason that the House rules would not admit of those increases. The gentleman spoke of the increase of the salary of the Doorkeeper. It is true that when this legislative appropriation bill was reported to the House from the Committee on Appropriations it did contain an increase of $500 to the salary of the Doorkeeper and that went out on a point of order. It is just, however, to the Senate I should state that the Senate has in no sense insisted in conference, or so far as I know anywhere else, on increasing the salary of any of the House employés except as the House might request and might desire.

Mr. STORM. Did not they attempt to reduce the salary of one of the reporters of this House by $500?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; the Senate put on an amendment to that effect, to take off $500 from the compensation voted by the House to one of its reporters, which, by the bye, was an increase of salary. We had voted to give him an increase of $1,000 and the Senate struck down the increase to $500. But the Senate very promptly receded from its amendment when it was told that the House desired to make that increase.

Mr. STORM. But the Senate undertook to reduce the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] and to my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] that I am not standing here as the champion of this proposition so far as I am individually concerned. I believe that the co-ordinate branches of the Legislature are in every respect as to matters of this kind equal; and so far as I am individually concerned I would do no act upon my own motion or by my vote that would discriminate in the pay, the perquisites, or the privileges of the members of the two bodies. But I was simply seeking to convey to the House what is and what has been the temper of the Senate concerning this matter. That body, I believe, unanimously insists upon this provision, representatives of that body in the conference stating at the same time that whatever the House may desire to do touching the conduct of its own business they do not propose to interfere with.

We are now brought to this pass: if the Senate insists we will have to recede or lose the bill.

I say further in my opinion if the Senators have clerks to assist them in the public business, Representatives have just as much need of and right to them as Senators.

I have made this statement to the House and it is for members to do what seems wise to them in this matter. I will say that unless the House recedes as to this amendment, as one member of the conference, if I should be continued upon it, I shall not feel called upon to agree to the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. Allow me to ask the gentleman what has become of the old controversy between the Senate and the House about the difference in the rate of compensation of their respective employés?

Mr. CANNON. That matter is not in conference in this bill, as the House did not place any legislation on this bill which would present the question.

Mr. MILLS. But the House employés are still receiving smaller pay than the employés of the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. That is apparently so, but not so in fact, for the reason that some of the employés of the House receive smaller pay than some of the employés of theSenate, others receive more. Besides, the practice has been heretofore for the House to provide a month's extra pay for its employés upon the sundry civil bill or the deficiency bill, and I apprehend that it will do it now before Congress adjourns. Therefore it substantially makes the salaries of the employés of the two Houses the same.

Mr. MILLS. Does not the Senate insist upon the same provision for its employés?

Mr. CANNON. I believe it has done so in one instance. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. This is not a new question of difference touching the power of one House to regulate the internal affairs of the other or to control the contingent fund of the other House. I recollect one serious dispute in former years on that subject, and it was found then, as I think it must be found now on a careful examination, that the interest and dignity of the House as well as of the Senate require us to respect the independence of a co-ordinate body.

We frequently charge upon our contingent fund more than it can bear. We make investigations and make appropriations out of that fund by resolution for the compensation of particular employés. If the Senate should interfere in all these details the two Houses would come into a perpetual wrangle touching the disposition of their contingent funds. If it was a matter involving an expenditure of a million of dollars or so it would be another thing. But when the Senate asks a sum for their contingent fund, for us to say that they shall dispose of that sum according to our will and not theirs, is to say that the Senate in return may control us in the disposition of our contingent fund at their will and not at ours.

Now I claim for this House the right to institute even an expensive investigation if they find it necessary, and to provide that it shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and to demand of the Senate a sufficient enlargement of that fund to enable that to be done. I also claim that for incidental purposes, such as temporary employés, we have the right as a House to say how much is necessary for that purpose, and how much temporary additional force shall be employed. The experience of members will bear me out in saying that we must have the control of our contingent fund without submitting it to the discretion of the Senate. And as I demand that for the House, I am willing to yield it within reasonable limits to the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a single word before the vote is taken on this proposition. I am not able to perceive, certainly not at the first blush, that this proposition is subject to the charge of interfering with the internal administration of the affairs of the Senate.

It seems to me that as to all matters of general and public concern, apart from the ordinary acts of the Senate as a separate body, the voice of the two Houses should be expressed in all legislation. I have never been able to understand why in regard to questions of public employment in the House or Senate, questions relating to the agencies incidentally connected with legislation, the voice of both bodies should not be heard in exactly the same degree as upon all other subjects. I think this was the earlier practice. In matters of this kind it appears to me each House should listen respectfully to the views or wishes of the other. If as to the entire field of employment in connection with either of these two bodies the other is to remain absolutely passive and silent, this other as to all those matters abandons its just share of the legislative power, and the other in respect to such matters is invested with complete and supreme legislative control. Such a view to my mind is not in harmony with the theory of our Government.

I am aware that any gentleman discussing a subject of difference like this between the two Houses should be prudent in his expressions; but I can not forget the fact, nor can my friend from Illinois, that for the deliberate purpose apparently—no, I will not say that, but with the inevitable result of evading the rules of proceeding deemed necessary by this House for prudent and wise legislation, amendments are frequently made in the other branch with respect to matters affecting this House and its internal administration. It is no answer to say that some gentlemen desire it to be done. Should not the will of the whole House, as deliberately expressed in its rules, be higher than that of any one member? Should not the wish of the majority be more potent than that of the minority? Yet, as my friend is aware, we frequently find upon appropriation bills coming from the Senate amendments which could not be incorporated under our rules—propositions which in some cases have been presented here and excluded under our rules. Provisions of this kind we find embodied in amendments in such a way as to evade the rules of the House. Now, if my friend from Illinois can mention any more direct interference with the internal procedure of either body than that method of accomplishing legislation I should be very glad to hear him do so.

It does not do for my friend to say—I think he forgot himself when he made that statement, for he is generally cautious in his language—it does not do for my friend to say that the managers on the part of the House if they persist must be triumphant. While those members represent the House, they are not the House. If those three gentlemen yield, the inevitable result is not only that the rules of the House are evaded, but inasmuch as a conference report must be voted upon as an entirety without any vote upon its individual parts, the will of the House is constantly and necessarily defeated. So long as this is the fact, I do not think any gentleman on this floor should be any more than courteous and prudent in talking about matters that affect the relations of the two great branches of the legislative department.

But I submit to my friend from Illinois we have here a proposition virtually to discriminate between the two Houses of Congress by a measure of legislation not affecting the members of the two bodies equally, but affecting alone the members of a single body. Have we had any other instance of the same kind? Does not the question here presented rise in importance in view of the fact that this is the first time we have had occasion to meet a question like this? When, in former years, newspapers were provided for members of Congress the same rule was applied to Senators as to Representatives. When, in more recent years, there was made a virtual addition of $125 to the salary of each member in the form of an allowance for stationery or an allowance in cash if the stationery should not be used, the same rule precisely was applied to the Senate. Every rule or act of legislation affecting members personally has been, up to the present time, made to operate equally with respect to members of the two branches.

The question, therefore, which this House is compelled to consider at this time is whether a proposition the advantages of which may promote the convenience of members of one body, but which must be enjoyed at the expense of an appropriation from the public Treasury, can be conceded by us without conceding at the same time that the body claiming the benefits of such legislation has the exclusive right, through the mere passive action of the House, to appropriate money for the advantage of its particular members, without reference to the wishes of the other branch.

My friend from Illinois puts the matter in this form: that we must either concede this matter now insisted upon by the Senate or we must go one step further, and for the purpose of putting these two bodies upon exactly the same footing give the members of this House precisely the same facilities as are claimed by Senators, precisely the same opportunities for rendering service to their constituencies; that, in other words, we must make a corresponding provision for members of the House. The conclusion is not at all an extraordinary one; it is very natural.

Mr. CANNON. My friend will allow me a moment. I know he does not desire to misrepresent me. I stated frankly to the House what I understood to be the temper of the Senate—what they were willing to do touching their contingent fund and touching ours. I tried to place the House in possession of the actual status of affairs, as my friend, I think, will acknowledge. I stated also that so far as I was concerned I was opposed to this proposition, and would in no event agree to it. If it be agreed to, this House of Representatives, so far as I am concerned, must take that burden upon its own shoulders.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad my friend from Illinois is definite.

Mr. CANNON. I thought I was definite before.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is more definite now, and I am glad he has expressed the opinion he has. [Cries of "Vote!"] You do not place both bodies on the same footing by receding from disagreement.

Mr. STORM. Has the Senate refused to insert the purpose of the appropriation?

Mr. HOLMAN. That would disclose what has taken place in conference, and I have no right to do that. It would be only just to the House to have the amendment read. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Twenty-first amendment: Strike out "ten" and insert "thirty-four;"

Twenty-fourth amendment: Strike out "sixty-two" and insert "seventy-six;" and

Twenty-fifth amendment: Strike out "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be expended for clerical services for any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress;"

So it will read:

"For fuel and oil and cotton-waste for the heating apparatus, $7,000; for furniture and repairs of furniture, $10,000; for packing-boxes, $770; for miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $34,000; and for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, $35,000; in all, $76,770.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] to recede from disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the same.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let us have the yeas and nays and see how many are in favor of this second edition of the salary-grab.

Mr. SPRINGER and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 121, not voting 147; as follows:

So the House refused to recede from its disagreement.

Mr. SCALES stated that his colleague [Mr. DOWD] was absent, excused by order of the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am paired with Mr. BARR, and therefore withdraw my vote, as it is not necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw my vote if not necessary to make a quorum.

(Subsequently he said he and Mr. LAMB, with whom he was paired, would vote the same way, and therefore he would let his vote stand.)

On motion of Mr. WELLER, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. DOWD was announced as paired with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, on all political questions, until further notice.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of a bill (S. 2233) for the relief of Lieut. John Hollins McBlair, in which concurrence was requested.

The message also announced the passage without amendment of a bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN'S motion that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 21, 24, and 25 was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement as to Senate amendment numbered 27, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, except verbal corrections made by the author of the speech, and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their author for correction they shall be returned to the Reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and if not so returned they shall then be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the original notes of the Reporter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have moved to insist on disagreement to test the sense of the House.

The SPEAKER. It does not cut off the motion to recede.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire at the proper time to move to recede from the disagreement.

The SPEAKER. Now is the proper time to make the motion.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then I submit that motion, that the House recede from its disagreement to this amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to this?

The SPEAKER. Not with the demand for the previous question pending. If the previous question is voted down, then it would be in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I ask unanimous consent to make this suggestion, that if the previous question be not ordered I would offer this amendment: "Provided, that this proposition shall not apply to speeches two pages long." [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is just what we want it to apply to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 60, noes 72.

Mr. BAYNE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered—nineteen members only voting in favor thereof.

So the motion to recede was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now renew the motion that the House further insist upon its disagreement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the House further insisted upon its disagreement; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 80 to 95 inclusive, and upon that I call for the previous question.

I am not certain but that perhaps it would be fair to divide that proposition, inasmuch as the amendment relating to the internal revenue, as well as the customs districts, is involved.

I ask leave, therefore, to modify my proposition, and move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 80 and 81, which cover the internal-revenue clause of the bill, and I ask that these amendments may be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 80: Strike out in line 910 of the printed bill the word "seven" and insert "eight;" so that it will read: "For salaries and expenses of collectors and deputy collectors, $1,850,000."

Amendment numbered 81 proposes to strike out the proviso, as follows: "Provided, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1884, there shall be no more than forty-three collection districts; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the internal-revenue districts to not exceeding the number aforesaid, in the manner heretofore provided by law."

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to these two amendments of the Senate and agree to the same; and on that I would like to be heard for a few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. That will be sufficient time. I only want to call the attention of the House to the fact that these amendments of the Senate strike out the proposed legislation of the House reducing the internal-revenue districts from eighty-four to forty-three.

Now, I do not want to talk about the merits of this proposition. I have fully discussed it, and it was fully discussed by other gentlemen when the bill was being considered by the House. As I recollect, the House, by a very considerable majority, however, proposed this legislation. The Senate struck it out; and I think it is proper I should state to the House, as I understand the fact to be, that the Senate is firm upon their amendment to strike out this proposed legislation.

Without, therefore, going into the merits of the proposition or consuming the time of the House in that respect, I may be permitted to say that I believe the Senate is right and the House is wrong with reference to this matter. We are now, Mr. Speaker, in the last closing hours of this session of Congress, and the Senate took the position that the body which proposes legislation upon an appropriation bill should give way when the other body does not assent and will not assent to it.

I have taken occasion before on a previous bill to state that I believe this to be a sound proposition. We have acted upon it heretofore in this Congress, and former Congresses have acted upon it. It is a wise rule for the settlement of these differences. Now, when legislation is proposed not upon an appropriation bill there is no coercion between the two Houses; but when it is proposed by either the House or the Senate upon an appropriation bill it presents a very different question; for if they can not agree, of course somebody must yield or else the bill will fail; and the practice, I state again, is that the body proposing it, when that state of facts arises, should yield. I believe it is absolutely necessary in order that an agreement may be reached upon this bill that the House should yield this point; and in doing this it will only be in pursuance of the practice which has prevailed between the two Houses.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word in response to the gentleman from Illinois.

The number of districts fixed by this bill when first reported to the House was sixty-three. The House reduced the number to forty-three, twenty less than the number fixed by the committee. Of course it may be if the subject were further considered, and if forty-three should not be deemed a proper number, that a number less than the present number, and yet greater than forty-three, might be satisfactory to both Houses.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 62.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. CANNON were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 82.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the House further insist on its disagreement to this amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup;

A bill (H. R. 6168) granting an increase of pension to Capt. H. D. F. Young;

A bill (H. R. 6184) granting a pension to Julia M. Reynolds;

A bill (H. R. 6786) granting a pension to Rivers Banks.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. Amendments numbered 82, 83, 84, 85, and 86 are the amendments of the Senate striking out the provisions which apply to the customs-collections districts. The conference on the part of the House have deemed it proper to report those amendments back to the House so that the subject might be further considered, as the House might deem proper. And for the purpose of bringing the subject before the House for action, with a view to an expression of its judgment, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to those amendments from 82 to 86 touching customs districts.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to those amendments.

These provisions that the Senate strikes out propose to consolidate and reduce the number of customs districts with certain other legislation. This matter was discussed to some extent in the House and quite fully in the Senate. It is useless for me at this late hour to go fully into the merits of the question. I must say, however, since the House acted upon it, I have upon some of those amendments changed my views. I was inclined to be for the amendments when the House placed them on the bill; but on further investigation I very seriously doubt their wisdom. I may say that in some respects, without taking the time of the House to state them, I am satisfied the proposed legislation would lead to very great abuses that none of us would be in favor of. But the same remark that I made in reference to the internal-revenue districts applies to these amendments. We propose to legislate, to change existing law upon this bill. The Senate proposes not to assent to that proposition. And I think it is the part of wisdom for us to recede; because I am satisfied that we will have to do it in the end under the practice between this House and the Senate and the temper of the Senate touching these amendments.

Mr. THOMPSON. For more than ten years the Secretary of the Treasury has annually recommended Congress to take action similar to what has been taken by the House on this appropriation bill; at last the House has agreed to his recommendation. He has told us exactly how much we can save, and we know his statements are true. The amount is about a million and a half less than the appropriations that were made last year.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman surely does not mean that.

Mr. THOMPSON. I mean exactly that.

Mr. LONG. The Secretary says it will save an amount less than $400,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. He says it is a million and a half of dollars less than was appropriated for these expenses last year.

Mr. CANNON. There was nothing appropriated last year.

Mr. THOMPSON. I say exactly what the Secretary says.

Mr. CANNON. If the Secretary says that, he is mistaken, because this is a permanent appropriation. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is made up of two classes. There is an appropriation of $2,750,000 semi-annually made, and there are also the fees which arise out of these very acts which are repealed and which are turned into the Treasury, amounting to over $7,900,000. And this is a million and a half of dollars less expense than the amount of these fees and these two semi-annual appropriations.

For ten years the Secretary has recommended that this change should be made, and now the House has agreed to his recommendation. He has gone over this subject carefully. He has considered it time and again. He has had his expert accountants go and inspect every customs district in this country with the salary and pay of every employé. He has gone to the expense in the last two years of having every line in these districts mapped out, and has furnished us a map to correspond to the sixty-nine districts provided in this bill.

We only comply with his demands, time and again repeated to us. This is a non-partisan view to take of this subject. The customs collection districts as laid down by him do not affect any party. It is a pure question of business economy. The President in his last message, accompanying the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, tells us that the present number of districts is not needed except for local pride, except as members of Congress want to aggrandize themselves and aggrandize their districts by having useless ports of entry established in them, and large public buildings erected and maintained at an enormous expense with all the coterie of useless officeholders about them, and unless we intend to carry out that policy and to maintain these districts from this time on we should agree to the legislation which has been made to us. In twenty-two of these districts we are told that not one dollar has been collected for the last ten years; that we have not only custom-house offices provided for them, but expensive buildings maintained at great cost to the Government, and unless we intend to keep up these useless districts which for ten years have not paid a dollar into the Treasury we must take this or some similar action.

The President tells us furthermore that there are thirty-odd districts, besides the twenty-two in which nothing has been collected for ten years, which pay less money into the Treasury than is annually expended in collecting the revenue there. Take the district of Evansville, Ind., for instance. We have there erected a custom-house at a cost of over $360,000, and we keep there a janitor to take care of the building. Yet for the last ten years, since the custom-house was erected, not a dollar has been collected in that district and paid into the Treasury.

Mr. SPRINGER. And never will be.

Mr. THOMPSON. And there never will be a dollar collected there. Yet that is one of the class of custom-house districts that we are called upon to maintain. I say that the House is right in this thing. We know we are right. We have done this upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has given it ten years of thought—not only the present occupant of that office but his predecessors—and after the most thorough and exhaustive investigation which he has made by means of experts——

Mr. MORSE. And a special commissioner appointed to investigate the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. And he has appointed special commissioners to investigate the matter. Yet with this recommendation staring us in the face, we are now asked to maintain these useless districts at an enormous expense to the people.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me a word right there?

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. This question was before the Committee of Ways and Means, but without any formal action taken upon it. I for one regard the error of this amendment to be in the imperative character of it. Instead of authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce the number of these districts so far as compatible with the public interest, which will enable the interests specially affected to have a hearing before him, and which will also enable members of Congress to have a hearing before him and to state all the facts within their knowledge, and not leave him to depend entirely upon the reports of agents, you have imperatively demanded a reduction of the districts to this particular number.

If the proposition was to give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to reduce the collection districts to a number not less than that named here, I think myself that the Senate ought to agree to give him a certain amount of discretion. But in the Committee on Ways and Means we have always found that there were questions of safety of revenue which were quite as important as the amount of revenue collected. Therefore I was opposed to this matter being taken up by the Committee on Appropriations, and trusted that they would wait until the Committee on Ways and Means had made some recommendation on the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. In reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I will state that the Secretary of the Treasury is in charge of the revenue, and so far as we know he would not surrender any of his power or any of his ability to collect the revenue authorized to be collected by law, and would not in any way endanger the collection of the revenue. He is charged with the responsibility of collecting the revenue; he is clothed with the power to collect it and we furnish him with the force for that purpose. Yet he tells us that we are cramming down his throat an unnecessary force to accomplish the objects which he wants to accomplish. He tells us that he will have power enough, after this consolidation, to collect every cent of the revenue.

What good does the district at Evansville, Ind., do? What good do the eight districts in Maine do? What good do the five districts in Massachusetts do? Why should we continue them when the Secretary of the Treasury says that he can collect the revenue without those districts? He has investigated the subject fully, and certainly ought to know what he is talking about. I refer not only to the present Secretary of the Treasury, for we do not rely upon him alone, but to every previous Secretary for ten years. They have all insisted upon this reduction.

I have carefully looked over the debates in the Senate upon this subject, and I fail to find any good reason assigned by any Senator for retaining the present number of districts. I fail to find any reason assigned except one which was assigned by a Senator, and that was that it would abolish some of the districts in his State, the continuance of which would possibly be a benefit to him, and therefore he did not desire to have them abolished.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman will agree with me that prior Secretaries of the Treasury have not named any precise number, though they have recommended consolidation of districts. I believe that some districts ought to be consolidated; but I doubt the propriety of intrusting to any one man a practical repeal of the legislation of Congress.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is not a repeal.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly it is. Where a district is established by law you propose that this officer of the Government shall abolish it; where a building has been erected you propose that he shall abandon its use.

Mr. THOMPSON. So far as that matter is concerned, I wish to say this is no new step. This measure does not invest the Secretary of the Treasury or the President with any extraordinary power. Are the customs collection districts more sacred in the estimation of the House and the country than the internal-revenue districts? Yet the President has had the power ever since the formation of the internal-revenue districts to abolish them, to reduce them, to consolidate them, or to rearrange them at any time according to his discretion. More than that, he has exercised this power; he has exercised it judiciously within the last twelve months.

I know it is contended—it has been contended elsewhere—that we invest him with extraordinary power—the right to name the ports of entry. It has even been urged that such a measure is unconstitutional; that ports of entry can only be established by acts of Congress. I concede it has been the rule heretofore that every port of entry should be specially established by act of Congress; and that is the reason there have been so many useless ports of entry.

If now you should leave it to the discretion of the President to reduce the number of these ports of entry as he might see fit, he would be overwhelmed by Representatives and Senators demanding that the reduction should be made in somebody else's district; that their particular ports of entry should be spared.

But before this pressure is brought to bear to swerve him from what he knows to be right, to prevent him from looking at this matter from a purely business standpoint and not from a political point of view, he has framed a plan with the districts marked out, with their respective ports of entry; and no reason has been given to us, no reason has been given elsewhere in the debate upon this subject, why we should not conform to this reasonable recommendation.

He has gone further than his predecessors in this matter. They recommended reduction; but he has shown us where the reduction can be made. Through his commissioners he has examined into the accounts of every one of these districts; he has given us the name of every officer and employé; he has shown every dollar collected, and he has pointed out where consolidation and reduction can take place; he has shown how this can be done, and at the same time every dollar of revenue be collected and the service maintained with the same efficiency as at present, affording equal facility for importation and for exportation.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many office-holders will be legislated out of office if this proposed change be made?

Mr. THOMPSON. No great number under this bill. The saving of money will arise largely in other ways—not so much from dispensing with office-holders as from the saving in rents and from the reduction of expenses in connection with the warehousing system. If I recollect aright only two hundred to three hundred officers and employés will be eliminated from the service by this legislation. There is no great reduction in the number of officers. Yet the demand is made that we shall retain them all.

This is purely a business transaction. It is in this light that the Secretary of the Treasury calls your attention to it. There is little or no politics in this question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Does the Secretary of the Treasury specify this exact number—sixty-nine?

Mr. THOMPSON. Sixty-nine is the exact number fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. If you will turn to the last annual message of the President of the United States, in which the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury is incorporated, you will find that the number there mentioned is sixty-seven. But since that recommendation it has been found necessary, on account of the completion of two railroads in Oregon, that two ports of entry should be established there; and for this reason the recommendation has been modified and those two additional districts recommended. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I am willing that the House shall vote upon this question at once; but I hope that the provision now under discussion will be insisted upon, because, as I believe, it is wise legislation and in the interest of economy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of calling the previous question, but before doing so I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] to the fact that this is not so much a question of districts as it is a question of ports of entry. The provision is that the President shall fix the boundaries of each reorganized district and designate the ports of entry therein.

My friend will see that coupled with the provision which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report in his regular estimates the estimates necessary for appropriations to carry on the customs system involves the whole matter. It is that provision numbered 86. That is the important one. It has been shown to us that is a law which was enacted last Congress, and regular estimates will come down in December for it.

I wish to say further that, inasmuch as there will be a further conference between the two Houses, it would seem proper these amendments should go to that conference, and therefore I hope, without objection, the motion made that the House further insist will be adopted on these several propositions. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CANNON'S motion to recede was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN'S motion to insist was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. The next amendment is the eighty-seventh amendment, and I move that the House further insist on its disagreement. The Senate strike out the entire provision touching the small distillers. Inasmuch as the other amendments have to go to a conference if one shall be appointed, I think I would ask the House to let this proposition go also. I will make the motion on this one, the eighty-seventh, and demand the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let it be read.

The eighty-seventh amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "one hundred and sixty-four" and insert "three hundred;" so it will read:

For salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers and for miscellaneous expenses, $2,300,000.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I find the important amendment is numbered the eighty-eighth. I hope by unanimous consent the vote will be taken on both.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a separate vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then as to the first I move the House insist on its disagreement.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I agree the vote shall be taken on both amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. They constitute but one amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let it be read, reserving the right to object.

The eighty-eighth amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the following:

"(88) That the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operation of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to payment of the tax; and said distilleries shall be run and operated without storekeepers; and said Secretary may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash twenty-five bushels of grain per day from the operation of the provision of said title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax; and any distillery so exempted shall be run as fruit distilleries are now operated: Provided, That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries, to be designated by him by his order, and in which any of said distillers may deposit his product, and when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removal, and otherwise as is now provided by law for other warehouses."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before the vote is taken I should like to be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insist on the disagreement to both amendments. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky want?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Five minutes. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for three minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Indiana alluded to this proposition when he first addressed the House. It is to this latter motion I desire to call the attention of the House. They may go both together, but it is the last part of the proviso which is the most objectionable, in that amendment. The whole amendment may be objectionable but I desire the attention of the House to the last part of it, the proviso there which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to designate a specially appointed warehouse to which the small distillers, for whom the first part of the amendment seems specially intended as a gratuity, shall bring their whisky.

And it will lead to more moonshine distilling than all the laws that have ever been made upon the statute-books with reference to this subject, for it practically prohibits the man from carrying on his business at all according to law unless he can mash ten bushels of grain per day and upward. The result will be to induce illicit distilling all over the country.

I can not, of course, state what was the object of the mover of this proposition, but whether it was the intention or otherwise that will be the effect of it. Besides nothing could have been enacted more for the benefit of the large distillers, those who make fifty or five hundred barrels a day, than this last proviso which the Senate has stricken out. It is but another link in the long chain which the large distillers have been throwing around the law-making powers of the Government to enable them to pile up whisky in bond on which they now have three years' time, seven and a half gallons allowed to them for leakage on every barrel of forty gallons, without payment of interest, without any payment of stamp tax, and no payment at all of tax in fact, because they are privileged to take it out of bond and export it and put new whisky in its place as soon as it is made. They are thus entitled to all of the benefits and the Government is the loser.

Now, if you want to encourage the piling up of this product in bonded warehouses and increase the power of this gigantic monopoly and give it greater weight and force upon the legislative bodies of this country, a monopoly that has raised over $700,000 at one time to be used in carrying elections in Indiana, Iowa, Ohio, and other States, all you need to do is simply to incorporate that proviso in the bill. I have fully discussed this matter at another time, and I ask a division of the question here now. I hope the House will recede.

Mr. THOMPSON rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky desires to be heard I will yield to him for three minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would not occupy a moment of the time of the House at this late hour and in opposition to the manifest inclination of the House to come to a vote at once upon this matter if it were not for the fact that I was the author of the amendment and think it due to the House that an explanation of it should be given, which I will endeavor briefly to do. It is not by any means subject to the interpretation given to it by the gentleman from Kentucky who has just taken his seat.

I desire the House to understand this whole question before the vote is taken. Up to 1868 we had nothing but these special bonded warehouses. The whisky was manufactured and put into the bonded warehouses by the Government, and storekeepers were appointed for each in accordance with the then existing law.

In 1868 this law was modified, and a storekeeper was appointed and put into every distillery, whether it was great or small; and this law also compelled the distiller to pay the salary of the storekeeper out of his own pocket, which payment was at the rate of $4 a day and was a heavy tax upon the small distillers. It was so harsh and unnatural, so unjust and exacting upon the smaller distillers, those who were running on small capacity, mashing less than ten bushels per day, that subsequently Congress interfered and made provision for the payment of the storekeepers out of the general fund of the Government; but it increased at the same time the tax upon whisky from 50 cents to 70 cents by a consolidation of the barrel-tax and various other small taxes upon the distillers, raising the whole amount to 70 cents, and as I have said made the salaries of the storekeepers payable out of the public Treasury instead of by the distilleries.

That relieved the little distilleries from their responsibility and there grew up all over the country innumerable small distilleries at each of which the Government paid from $1,200 to $1,500 a year salary to the storekeepers. Out of this an abuse grew in the nature of things, because this amount of salary was frequently divided between the distiller and the storekeeper, while the Government got no part of the tax; and in fact many of the larger distilleries throughout the country divided themselves up into smaller distilleries, mashing from three to five bushels a day, so as to have the advantage of the storekeeper and the salary; and therefore instead of consolidation you simply multiplied the offices and the expenses to the Government.

Now, the object of this amendment is to put the small grain distillers exactly on the same footing as the fruit distillers are without storekeepers. The fruit distiller is compelled to pay his tax at the end of sixty days after the manufacture of the product. This would compel the small grain distiller, if that provision was not incorporated in the bill, to pay cash at once on the manufacture of his whisky, whereas by that provision he can put it in the warehouse.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to finish my sentence.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask if it is not true that there is this difference between the fruit and grain distillers——

The SPEAKER (rapping with his gavel). The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not object to non-concurrence on this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to argue the merits, but I wish to call the attention of the House to one or two facts in connection with the matter. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Gentlemen say "let us vote." It would hasten legislation, I think, if the House would take three or four minutes to consider this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CANNON. Two minutes at the outside.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I want to state that the House has concurred in a later amendment——

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a question of order. I want to finish the statement I was making.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] had expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed two minutes more. [Cries of "Regular order!"] It would facilitate matters very much to allow the gentleman to speak on this subject. He understands it. If my colleague does not understand his side of this subject, nobody does.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has yielded two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who is now on the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Later on in this bill the House has consented to an amendment, and the Senate also, fixing the pay of storekeepers at distilleries of twenty bushels or less registered capacity at $2 per day. That cuts down their compensation one-half or more. Now I want to say to the House that the pending proposition in the bill is one on which in my judgment the House ought to recede. It will increase these small distilleries by the thousands. I do not think any of us want to do that, and I believe we ought to agree with the Senate on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to these amendments and agree to the same; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] demands the previous question on the pending motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 56.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, numbered 87 and 88.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Amendments 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, and 95 are the remaining amendments connected with the internal revenue. Amendment 93 is the one which increases the number of special agents from five, as fixed by the House, to twenty-five. That is perhaps the most important of these amendments.

While conceding that on a portion of those propositions the House might well yield, there are one or two at least which ought to be insisted on. But they have all to be considered together, to make the action of any body of conferees effective. I, therefore, move that the House further insist on its disagreement to amendments from 89 to 95, inclusive, and hope the House will, without objection, let the subject go to the same conferees to which the other provisions shall go. I hope my friend from Illinois will not object to that.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word. If I had known the House was to formally insist upon its disagreement I should not have detained the House. I was verdant enough, however, to suppose when we commenced to consider these disagreements they would be considered with a view to getting at the right action to be taken by the House with regard to each. But as the gentleman insists that each and all of them as they are shall go to the conferees, and as his side of the House is disposed to sustain him in that action, I will withdraw all further opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will find that this action is not so entirely formal. I have not detained the House for the purpose of going into the details and pointing out what I think the House should insist upon. But I feel that all these amendments standing together as they do the disagreement between the two Houses as to them should be insisted on, and they should go to a conference, not as a matter of form, but as a matter of substance as to most of them; not all of them, but most of them. They all stand together. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is it desired to have the amendments reported?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 89 to 95, inclusive.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, as to the amendments from 205 to 212, the motion I make is merely a formal one. If before this report comes in the Senate shall finally ascertain that the Mexican pension bill can not pass, then of course the Senate will recede and that is the end of it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is that the provision in reference to the Mexican war pensions?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. What is the amount?

Mr. HOLMAN. It amounts in all to about $206,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If that bill passes, I will state to the gentleman that it will require at least $50,000,000 more to be appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is talking about quite a different thing. This is only for the personnel of the Pension Bureau; nothing more. I therefore call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments indicated.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. With a view of reaching an agreement by the two Houses, and in anticipation of the action of the Senate, if it is proper I move that the House request a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. HANCOCK, and Mr. CANNON.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the House now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins;

A bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary T. Barnes;

A bill (H. R. 2105) granting a pension to John A. Shuckers;

A bill (H. R. 2702) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. 3591) for the relief of Sarah A. Becktel;

A bill (H. R. 3737) granting a pension to Ann McLaughlin;

A bill (H. R. 4767) granting a pension to Mary A. Henry; and

A bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HENLEY asked leave to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as a part of the debates of the House, some remarks prepared by him on the subject of Government land grants.

Mr. VALENTINE objected.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, to attend the Chicago convention.

To Mr. THROCKMORTON, for ten days, commencing with July 5.

To Mr. STOCKSLAGER, for the remainder of the session, on account of important business.

To Mr. ERMENTROUT, for one week.

To Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, for one week.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. What is the order of the House about the hour of meeting to-morrow? Do we meet at 9 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make that parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered that the session of to-morrow shall begin at 9 o'clock a. m.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the House shall adjourn now, will it not virtually put us back to where we were yesterday when we began on the Mexican pension bill?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] to withdraw his motion to adjourn, and yield to me to make a motion that the House now take a recess until five minutes before 9 o'clock to-morrow, so as to leave the Mexican pension bill in statu quo.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. RANDALL. And it requires a quorum to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 40, noes 25.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, called for tellers.

A MEMBER. Do you want us to stay here all night?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am willing to stay all night to pass that bill.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers, and there were 17 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no "other side" upon ordering tellers. The rule of the House requires one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers, which is a fixed number, 33.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. HERBERT was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes a. m., Saturday, July 5) the House adjourned until 9 o'clock a. m. Saturday.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 4, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. E. G. ANDREWS, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceeding's, when, on motion of Mr. MORRILL and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

READING OF DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order adopted by the Senate yesterday will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will meet at the usual hour on Friday, the 4th day of July instant, and, after the reading of the Journal and before other business is done, the Secretary of the Senate shall read the Declaration of American Independence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to this special order the Secretary will now read the Declaration of American Independence.

The Secretary (ANSON G. MCCOOK) thereupon read the Declaration of American Independence.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion; and

A bill (H. R. 4996) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. ROSECRANS of California, Mr. ROBERT M. MURRAY of Ohio, and Mr. THEODORE LYMAN of Massachusetts managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had directed the return to the Senate of the bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations;

A bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 6409) to validate and cure defects in certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7235) "making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 12, 13, 14, 17, 20, 23, 40, 52, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 69, 70, 72, 73, 74, 77, 78, 80, 88, 89, 90, 91, 93, 94, 114, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 139, 140, 141, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, and 223.

Mr. HALE. Upon this bill, which is the main deficiency bill of the session, the conferees of the two Houses after prolonged and laborious sessions, both by night and day, were able to reach an agreement on the larger number of items in dispute. The amount of difference between the two Houses in money was $1,263,514.56. Of this, in that part of the report which embraces the agreement of the conferees of the two Houses, the Senate conferees recede from amendments amounting to $327,932.88 and the House conferees recede from its disagreement to amendments to the amount of $176,359.14. The larger part of the items on which the Senate conferees yielded were embraced in a long list of old claims in the different Departments. We found the House conferees absolutely declining to make appropriations for them, and therefore the Senate conferees yielded.

After going through the bill and its many items the conferees found themselves entirely unable to agree upon twenty-three different amendments, and I wish to refer briefly to what these are so that the Senate may know and then to take the instruction of the Senate upon them. At the close of what I may say with reference to them I shall move that the Senate insist upon its amendments which are comprehended in this list and ask for a further conference.

The first five items are small items relating to the paving of streets and roadways around public buildings owned by the Government in various cities in different States. The Senate conferees saw no reason why the Government should not pay its proportion of these bills under the municipal laws of the different cities. The bills are not large, but the House conferees took the ground that the Government should pay nothing with reference to the streets about its property, and there the two Houses were unable to agree.
